Alice's ADVENTURES in WONDERLAND

By Lewis Carroll

(Adapted by Joseph Cowley)

King and Queen inspecting tarts in courtroom (page 77)

OceanofPDF.com

ALICE'S ADVENTURES IN WONDERLAND

by Lewis Carroll

Drawings by John Tenniel

adapted by Joseph Cowley

CLASSICS CONDENSED BY COWLEY

iUniverse, Inc.
Bloomington

OceanofPDF.com

Alice in Wonderland by Lewis Carroll
Adapted by Joseph Cowley

Copyright © 2012 by Joseph Cowley

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be used or reproduced by any means, graphic, electronic, or mechanical, including photocopying, recording, taping or by any information storage retrieval system without the written permission of the publisher except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews.

This is a work of fiction. All of the characters, names, incidents, organizations, and dialogue in this novel are either the products of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously.

This work meets the qualifications for ESL students reading at level 4 of the Ladder series. Photo of Lewis Carroll courtesy of Wikipedia.

iUniverse books may be ordered through booksellers or by contacting:

iUniverse
1663 Liberty Drive
Bloomington, IN 47403
www.iuniverse.com
1-800-Authors (1-800-288-4677)

Because of the dynamic nature of the Internet, any web addresses or links contained in this book may have changed since publication and may no longer be valid. The views expressed in this work are solely those of the author and do not necessarily reflect the views of the publisher, and the publisher hereby disclaims any responsibility for them.

Any people depicted in stock imagery provided by Thinkstock are models, and such images are being used for illustrative purposes only.

Certain stock imagery © Thinkstock.

ISBN: 978-1-4759-3276-8 (sc)
ISBN: 978-1-4759-3277-5 (e)

Library of Congress Control Number: 2012910778

iUniverse rev. date: 6/27/2012

OceanofPDF.com

For Bernice Friedson, as always

OceanofPDF.com

Contents

Chapter I Down the Rabbit-Hole
Chapter II The Pool of Tears
Chapter III A Group-Race and a Long Tale
Chapter IV The Rabbit Sends in a Little Bill
Chapter V Advice from a Caterpillar
Chapter VI Pig and Pepper
Chapter VII A Mad Tea-Party
Chapter VIII The Queen’s Croquet-Ground
Chapter IX The Mock Turtle’s Story
`Chapter X The Lobster Quadrille
Chapter XI Who Stole the Tarts?
Chapter XII Alice’s Evidence

OceanofPDF.com

CHAPTER I

DOWN THE RABBIT-HOLE

Alice was beginning to get very tired of sitting by her sister on the bank, and of having nothing to do. Once or twice she took a look at the book her sister was reading, but it had no pictures or talking in it, ‘and what is the use of a book,’ thought Alice ‘without pictures or talk?’

She was considering (as well as she could, for the hot day made her feel very sleepy and dull), whether the pleasure of making a chain of flowers would be worth the trouble of getting up and picking the flowers, when suddenly a White Rabbit with pink eyes ran close by her.

White Rabbit checking watch

There was nothing so VERY strange in that; nor did Alice think it so VERY much out of the way to hear the Rabbit say to itself, ‘Oh dear! Oh dear! I shall be late!’ (When she thought it over afterwards, it occurred to her that she ought to have wondered at this, but at the time it all seemed quite natural).

But when the Rabbit actually TOOK A WATCH OUT OF ITS POCKET, and looked at it, and then hurried on, Alice started to her feet, for it flashed across her mind that she had never before seen a rabbit with either a pocket, or a watch to take out of it.

Wondering how this could be, she ran across the field after it, and was lucky enough to see it jump into a large hole beneath a bush. In another moment down went Alice into the hole after it, never once considering how in the world she was to get out again.

The hole went straight on for some way, and then dropped suddenly down, so suddenly that Alice had not a moment to think about stopping herself before she found herself falling down a very deep well. Either the well was very deep, or she fell very slowly, for she had plenty of time as she went down to look about her and to wonder what was going to happen next.

First, she tried to look down and make out what she was coming to. But it was too dark to see anything. Then she looked at the sides of the well, and noticed that they were filled with cup-boards and book-shelves. Here and there she saw maps and pictures hanging on the walls.

She took down a container from one of the shelves as she passed. It had ‘ORANGE MARMALADE’ written on it, but she was greatly disappointed to find it was empty. She did not like to drop it for fear of killing somebody, so she managed to put it into one of the cup-boards as she fell past it.

‘Well!’ thought Alice to herself, ‘after such a fall as this, I shall think nothing of falling down the stairs! How brave they’ll all think me at home! Why, I wouldn’t say anything about it, even if I fell off the top of the house!’ (Which was very likely true.)

Down, down, down. Would the fall NEVER come to an end! ‘I wonder how many miles I’ve fallen by this time?’ she said aloud. ‘I must be getting somewhere near the center of the earth.

‘Let me see: that would be four thousand miles down, I think – ‘ (for, you see, Alice had learnt several things of this sort in her lessons in school, and though this was not a VERY good opportunity for showing off her knowledge, as there was no one to listen to her, still it was good practice to say it over) ‘– yes, that’s about the right distance. But I wonder what

Latitude or Longitude I've got to?' (Alice had no idea what Latitude was, or Longitude either, but thought they were nice grand words to say.)

Soon she began again: 'I wonder if I shall fall right THROUGH the earth! How funny it'll seem to come out among the people that walk with their heads down where their feet should be! The Antipathies, I think –' (she was rather glad there WAS no one listening, this time, as it didn't sound at all the right word) '– but I shall have to ask them what the name of the country is, you know.

'Please, Miss, is this New Zealand or Australia?' (and she tried to give a little bow as she spoke – fancy bowing as you're falling through the air! Do you think you could manage it?) 'And what a poorly educated little girl she'll think me for asking! No, it'll never do to ask: perhaps I shall see it written up somewhere.'

Down, down, down. There was nothing else to do, so Alice soon began talking again. 'Dinah will miss me very much tonight, I should think!' (Dinah was the cat.) 'I hope they'll remember her bowl of milk at tea-time.

'Dinah my dear! I wish you were down here with me! There are no mice in the air, I'm afraid, but you might catch a bat, and that's very like a mouse, you know. But do cats eat bats, I wonder?' And here Alice began to get rather sleepy, and went on saying to herself, in a dreamy sort of way, 'Do cats eat bats? Do cats eat bats?' and sometimes, 'Do bats eat cats?' For you see, as she couldn't answer either question, it didn't much matter which way she put it.

She felt that she was dropping off to sleep, and had just begun to dream that she was walking hand in hand with Dinah, and saying to her very seriously, 'Now, Dinah, tell me the truth: did you ever eat a bat?' when suddenly she landed upon a pile of sticks and dry leaves, and the fall was over.

Alice was not a bit hurt, and she jumped to her feet in a moment. She looked up, but it was all dark over-head. Before her was another long passage, and the White Rabbit was still in sight, hurrying down it. There was not a moment to be lost.

Away went Alice like the wind, and was just in time to hear it say, as it turned a corner, 'Oh my ears and whiskers, how late it's getting!' She was close behind it when she turned the corner. But the Rabbit was no longer to be seen.

She found herself in a long, low hall lit by a row of lamps hanging from the roof. There were doors all round the hall, but they were all locked; and when Alice had been all the way down one side and up the other, trying every door, she walked sadly down the middle, wondering how she was ever to get out again.

Suddenly she came upon a little three-legged table, all made of solid glass. There was nothing on it except a tiny golden key, and Alice's first thought was that it might belong to one of the doors of the hall. But, alas! Either the locks were too large, or the key was too small, for, at any rate, it would not open any of them.

However, on the second time round, she came upon a low curtain she had not noticed before. Behind it was a little door about fifteen inches high. She tried the little golden key in the lock, and to her great delight it fitted!

Alice finding tiny door behind curtain

Alice opened the door and found that it led into a small hall-way, not much larger than a rat-hole. She knelt down and looked along the hall-way into the loveliest garden you ever saw. How she longed to get out of that dark hall, and wander about among those beds of bright flowers and cool fountains.

But she could not even get her head through the door-way; ‘and even if my head would go through,’ thought poor Alice, ‘it would be of very little use without my shoulders.

‘Oh, how I wish I could shut up like a telescope! I think I could, if I only knew how to begin.’

For, you see, so many out-of-the-way things had happened lately, that Alice had begun to think that very few things indeed were really impossible.

There seemed to be no use waiting by the little door, so she went back to the table, half hoping she might find another key on it, or at any rate a book of rules for shutting people up like telescopes.

This time she found a little bottle on it (‘which certainly was not here before,’ said Alice), and round the neck of the bottle was a paper label, with the words ‘DRINK ME’ beautifully printed on it in large letters.

Alice taking “Driank Me” bottle

It was all very well to say ‘Drink me,’ but the wise little Alice was not going to do THAT in a hurry. ‘No, I’ll look first,’ she said, ‘and see whether it’s marked “poison” or not’.

For she had read several nice little histories about children who had got burnt, and eaten up by wild beasts and other unpleasant things, all because they WOULD not remember the simple rules their friends had taught them: such as that a red-hot iron will burn you if you hold it too long; and that if you cut your finger VERY deeply with a knife, it usually bleeds; and she had never forgotten that, if you drink much from a bottle marked ‘poison,’ it is almost certain to disagree with you, sooner or later.

However, this bottle was NOT marked ‘poison,’ so Alice dared to taste it. Finding it very nice (it had, in fact, a sort of mixed flavor of cherry, custard, pine-apple, baked chicken, coffee, and hot buttered bread), she very soon finished it off.

‘What a curious feeling!’ said Alice; ‘I must be shutting up like a telescope.’ And so it was. She was now only ten inches high, and her face grew bright at the thought that she was now the right size for going through the little door into that lovely garden.

First, however, she waited for a few minutes to see if she was going to grow any smaller. She felt a little nervous about this. ‘For it might end, you know,’ said Alice to herself, ‘in my going out altogether, like a light. I wonder what I should be like then?’ And she tried to fancy what a light is like after it blown out, for she could not remember ever having seen such a thing.

After a while, finding that nothing more happened, she decided on going into the garden at once. But, alas for poor Alice! When she got to the door, she found she had forgotten the little golden key, and when she went back to the table for it, she found she could not possibly reach it.

She could see it quite plainly through the glass, and she tried her best to climb up one of the legs of the table, but she kept slipping; and when she had tired herself out with trying, the poor little thing sat down and cried.

‘Come, there’s no use in crying like that!’ said Alice to herself, rather sharply. ‘I advise to you is to leave off this minute!’

She generally gave herself very good advice (though she very seldom followed it), and sometimes she talked to herself so strongly as to bring tears into her eyes. Once she remembered trying to box her own ears for breaking the rules in a game she was playing against herself (for this curious child was very fond of pretending to be two people).

‘But it’s no use now,’ thought poor Alice, ‘making believe I’m two people! Why, there’s hardly enough of me left to make ONE respectable person!’

Soon her eye fell on a little glass box that was lying under the table: she opened it, and found in it a very small cake, on which the words ‘EAT ME’ were beautifully marked.

‘Well, I’ll eat it,’ said Alice, ‘and if it makes me grow larger, I can reach the key; and if it makes me grow smaller, I can creep under the door; so either way I’ll get into the garden, and I don’t care which happens!’

She ate a little bit, and said anxiously to herself, ‘Which way? Which way?’ holding her hand on the top of her head to feel which way it was growing.

She was quite surprised to find that she remained the same size. To be sure, this generally happens when one eats cake, but Alice had got so much into the way of expecting nothing but out-of-the-way things to happen, that it seemed quite dull and foolish for life to go on in the common way.

So she set to work, and very soon finished off the cake.

OceanofPDF.com

CHAPTER II

THE POOL OF TEARS

‘Curiouser and curiouser!’ cried Alice (she was so much surprised, that for the moment she quite forgot how to speak good English); ‘now I’m opening out like the largest telescope that ever was! Good-bye, feet!’ (For when she looked down at her feet, they seemed to be almost out of sight, they were getting so far off.)

‘Oh, my poor little feet, I wonder who will put on your shoes and stockings for you now, dears? I’m sure I shan’t be able! I shall be a great deal too far off to trouble myself about you. You must manage the best way you can But I must be kind to them,’ thought Alice, ‘or perhaps they won’t walk the way I want to go!

‘Let me see: I’ll give them a new pair of boots every Christmas.’ And she went on planning to herself how she would manage it. ‘They must go by the carrier,’ she thought; ‘and how funny it’ll seem, sending presents to one’s own feet! And how odd the directions will look!

ALICE’S RIGHT FOOT,

FIRE-PLACE RUG,

NEAR THE SCREEN,

(WITH ALICE’S LOVE).

‘Oh dear, what nonsense I’m talking!’

Just then her head struck against the roof of the hall. In fact, she was now more than nine feet high, and she at once took up the little golden key and hurried off to the garden door.

Poor Alice! It was as much as she could do, lying down on one side, to look through into the garden with one eye; but to get through was more hopeless than ever. She sat down and began to cry again.

‘You ought to be shamed of yourself,’ said Alice, ‘a great girl like you,’ (she might well say this), ‘to go on crying in this way! Stop it this moment, I tell you!’

But she went on all the same, crying a storm of tears, until there was a large pool all round her, about four inches deep and reaching half down the hall.

After a time she heard the pat-pat of little feet in the distance, and she quickly dried her eyes to see what was coming. It was the White Rabbit returning, splendidly dressed, with a pair of white kid gloves in one hand and a large fan in the other.

He came running along in a great hurry, talking to himself as he came, ‘Oh! the Duchess, the Duchess! Oh! Won’t she be angry if I’ve kept her waiting!’

Alice was in such despair that she was ready to ask help of any one; so, when the Rabbit came near her, she began, in a low, fearful voice, ‘If you please, sir…’

Giant Alice watching Rabbit run away

The Rabbit started anxiously, dropped the white kid gloves and the fan, and hurried away into the darkness as fast as he could go.

Alice took up the fan and gloves, and, as the hall was very hot, she kept fanning herself all the time she went on talking.

‘Dear, dear! How strange everything is today! And yesterday things went on just as usual. I wonder if I’ve been changed in the night? Let me think.

‘Was I the same when I got up this morning? I almost think I can remember feeling a little different. But if I’m not the same, the next question is, Who in the world am I? Ah, THAT’S the great puzzle!’

And she began thinking over all the children she knew that were of the same age as herself, to see if she could have been changed for any of them.

‘I’m sure I’m not Ada,’ she said, ‘for her hair goes in such long curls, and mine doesn’t go in curls at all. And I’m sure I can’t be Mabel, for I know all sorts of things, and she, oh! She knows such a very little! Besides, SHE’S she, and I’m I, and – oh dear, how puzzling it all is!

‘I’ll try if I know all the things I used to know. Let me see: four times five is twelve, and four times six is thirteen, and four times seven is – oh dear! I shall never get to twenty at that rate! However, the Multiplication Table doesn’t mean anything. Let’s try Geography.

‘London is the capital of Paris, and Paris is the capital of Rome, and Rome – no, THAT’S all wrong, I’m certain! I must have been changed for Mabel!

‘I’ll try and say “How does the little –”’ and she crossed her hands on her lap as if she were saying lessons, and began to repeat it. But her voice sounded strange, and the words did not come the same as they used to do:

‘How does the little crocodile

Improve his shining tail,

And pour the waters of the Nile

On every golden scale!

‘How cheerfully he seems to grin,

How neatly spread his claws,

And welcome little fishes in

With gently smiling jaws!’

‘I’m sure those are not the right words,’ said poor Alice, and her eyes filled with tears again as she went on.

‘I must be Mabel after all, and I shall have to go and live in that tiny little house, and have next to no toys to play with, and oh! Ever so many lessons to learn!

‘No, I’ve made up my mind about it. If I’m Mabel, I’ll stay down here! It’ll be no use their putting their heads down and saying “Come up again, dear!”

‘I shall only look up and say, “Who am I then? Tell me that first, and then, if I like being that person, I’ll come up. If not, I’ll stay down here till I’m somebody else.”

‘But, oh dear!’ cried Alice, with a sudden burst of tears, ‘I do wish they WOULD put their heads down! I am so VERY tired of being all alone here!’

As she said this she looked down at her hands, and was surprised to see that she had put on one of the Rabbit’s little white kid gloves while she was talking. ‘How CAN I have done that?’ she thought. ‘I must be growing small again.’

She got up and went to the table to measure herself by it, and found that, as nearly as she could guess, she was now about two feet high, and was still growing smaller rapidly. She soon found that the cause of this was the fan she was holding, and she dropped it in a hurry, just in time to avoid getting so small that she passed away completely.

‘That WAS a narrow escape!’ said Alice, made a good deal afraid at the sudden change, but very glad to find herself still in existence. ‘And now for the garden!’

She ran with all speed back to the little door. But alas! The little door was shut again, and the little golden key was lying on the glass table as before.

‘Things are worse than ever,’ thought the poor child, ‘for I never was so small as this before, never! And I declare it’s too bad, that it is!’

As she said these words her foot slipped, and in another moment, splash! She was up to her chin in salt water.

Her first idea was that she had somehow fallen into the sea. ‘In that case I can go back by railway,’ she said to herself. (Alice had been to the seaside once in her life, and had concluded that wherever you go on the English coast you find some children digging in the sand with wooden spoons, then a row of bath houses, and behind them a railway station.)

However, she soon made out that she was in the pool of tears which she had wept when she was nine feet high.

Alice in pool of tears

‘I wish I hadn’t cried so much!’ said Alice, as she swam about, trying to find her way out. ‘I shall be punished for it now, I suppose, by being drowned in my own tears! That WILL be a queer thing, to be sure! However, everything is queer to-day.’

Just then she heard something swimming about in the pool a little way off, and she swam nearer to make out what it was. At first she thought it must be a huge animal of some kind, but then she remembered how small she was now, and soon made out that it was only a mouse that had slipped into the water like herself.

Alice in pool of tears with Mouse

‘Would it be of any use, now,’ thought Alice, ‘to speak to this mouse? Everything is so out-of-the-way down here, that I should think very likely it can talk. At any rate, here’s no harm in trying.’ So she began:

‘O Mouse, do you know the way out of this pool? I am very tired of swimming about here!’ (Alice thought this must be the right way of speaking to a mouse. She had never done such a thing before, but she remembered having seen in her brother’s Latin Grammar, ‘A mouse - of a mouse – to a mouse – O mouse!’)

The Mouse gave her rather inquiring look, and seemed to her to close one of its little eyes, but it said nothing.

‘Perhaps it doesn’t understand English,’ thought Alice. ‘I dare say it’s a French mouse, come over with William the Conqueror.’ (For, with all her knowledge of history, Alice had no very clear notion how long ago anything had happened.) So she began again:

‘Ou est ma chatte?’ which was the first sentence in her French lesson-book. The Mouse gave a sudden leap out of the water, and seemed to shake all over with fear.

‘Oh, I beg your pardon!’ cried Alice quickly, afraid that she had hurt the poor animal’s feelings. ‘I quite forgot you didn’t like cats.’

‘Not like cats!’ cried the Mouse, in a voice filled with hurt. ‘Would YOU like cats if you were me?’

‘Well, perhaps not,’ said Alice in a calming tone. ‘Don’t be angry about it. And yet I wish I could show you our cat Dinah. I think you’d take a fancy to cats if you could only see her.

‘She is such a dear quiet thing,’ Alice went on, half to herself, as she swam about in the pool, ‘and she sits so nicely by the fire, licking her feet and washing her face – and she is such a nice soft thing to nurse - and she’s such a capital one for catching mice.

‘Oh, I beg your pardon!’ cried Alice again, for this time the Mouse was angry all over, and she felt certain it must be really hurt. ‘We won’t talk about her any more if you’d rather not.’

‘We indeed!’ cried the Mouse, who was trembling down to the end of his tail. ‘As if I would talk on such a subject! Our family always HATED cats: terrible, low, dirty things! Don’t let me hear the name again!’

‘I won’t indeed!’ said Alice, in a great hurry to change the subject. ‘Are you – are you fond – of – of dogs?’

The Mouse did not answer, so Alice went on eagerly: ‘There is such a nice little dog near our house I should like to show you! A little bright-eyed dog, you know, with oh, such long curly brown hair!

‘And it’ll fetch things when you throw them, and it’ll sit up and beg for its dinner, and all sorts of things – I can’t remember half of them – and it belongs to a farmer, you know, and he says it’s so useful, it’s worth a hundred pounds! He says it kills all the rats and – oh dear!’ cried Alice in a sorrowful tone, ‘I’m afraid I’ve offended it again!’

For the Mouse was swimming away from her as hard as it could go, and making quite a to-do in the pool as it went. So she called softly after it, ‘Mouse dear! Do come back again, and we won’t talk about cats or dogs either, if you don’t like them!’

When the Mouse heard this, it turned round and swam slowly back to her. Its face was quite pale (with passion, Alice thought), and it said in a low trembling voice, ‘Let us get to the shore, and then I’ll tell you my history, and you’ll understand why it is I hate cats and dogs.’

It was high time to go, for the pool was getting quite crowded with the birds and animals that had fallen into it. There were a Duck and a Dodo, a Lory and an Eaglet, and several other curious creatures. Alice led the way, and the whole party swam to the shore.

OceanofPDF.com

CHAPTER III

A GROUP-RACE AND A LONG TALE

They were indeed a strange-looking party that got together on the bank – the birds with their feathers all this way and that, the animals with their fur stuck to them, and all dropping wet drops of water, cross, and uncomfortable.

The first question, of course, was how to get dry again. They had a talk about this, and after a few minutes it seemed quite natural to Alice to find herself talking with them on a familiar basis, as if she had known them all her life.

Indeed, she had quite a long argument with the Lory, who at last had her feelings hurt, and would only say, ‘I am older than you, and must know better’. This Alice would not allow without knowing how old it was, and, as the Lory refused to tell its age, there was no more to be said.

At last the Mouse, who seemed to be a person of authority among them, called out, ‘Sit down, all of you, and listen to me! I’LL soon make you dry enough!’

They all sat down at once in a large ring, with the Mouse in the middle. Alice kept her eyes anxiously fixed on it, for she felt sure she would catch a bad cold if she did not get dry very soon.

‘Ahem!’ said the Mouse with an important air, ‘are you all ready? This is the driest thing I know. Silence all round, if you please! “William the Conqueror, whose cause was favored by the Pope, was soon given in to by the English, who wanted leaders, and had been of late much used to being taken over and ordered about. Edwin and Morcar, the earls of Mercia and Northumbria –”’

‘That’s awful!’ said the Lory, shaking itself.

‘I beg your pardon!’ said the Mouse, making a face, but very politely. ‘Did you speak?’

‘Not I!’ said the Lory quickly.

‘I thought you did,’ said the Mouse. ‘I proceed. “Edwin and Morcar, the lords of Mercia and Northumbria, declared for him: and even Stigand, the Archbishop of Canterbury, found it sensible –”’

‘Found WHAT?’ said the Duck.

‘‘Found IT,’ the Mouse replied rather angrily. ‘Of course you know what “it” means.’

‘I know what “it” means well enough, when I find a thing,’ said the Duck. ‘It’s generally something to eat. The question is, what did the Archbishop find?’

The Mouse did not notice this question, but hurried on,’ “– found it made sense to go with Edgar Atheling to meet William and offer him the crown. William’s conduct at first was sensible. But the lack of respect of his Normans –” How are you getting on now, my dear?’it continued, turning to Alice as it spoke.

‘As wet as ever,’ said Alice in a sad tone. ‘It doesn’t seem to dry me at all.’

‘In that case,’ said the Dodo gravely, rising to its feet, ‘I move that the meeting be closed, for the immediate taking up of more energetic cures.’

‘Speak English!’ said the Eaglet.

‘I don’t know the meaning of half those long words, and, what’s more, I don’t believe you do either!’ And the Eaglet bent down its head to hide a smile; and some of the other birds could be heard laughing.

‘What I was going to say,’ said the Dodo, its feelings hurt by all this, ‘was, that the best thing to get us dry would be a Caucus-race.’

‘What IS a Caucus-race?’ said Alice. Not that she wanted much to know, but the Dodo had paused as if it thought that SOMEBODY ought to speak, and no one else seemed about to say anything.

‘Why,’ said the Dodo, ‘the best way to explain it is to do it.’ (And, as you might like to try the thing yourself, some winter day, I will tell you how the Dodo managed it.)

First it marked out a race-course, in a sort of circle (‘The exact shape doesn’t matter,’ it said,), and then all the party were placed along the course, here and there.

There was no, ‘One, two, three, and away.’ They began running when they liked, and left off when they liked, so that it was not easy to know when the race was over. However, when they had been running half an hour or so, and were quite dry again, the Dodo suddenly called out:

‘The race is over!’ and they all crowded round it, out of breath, and asking, ‘But who has won?’

This question the Dodo could not answer without a great deal of thought, and it sat for a long time with one finger pressed upon its forehead (the position in which you usually see Shakespeare, in the pictures of him), while the rest waited in silence.

At last the Dodo said, ‘EVERYBODY has won, and all must have prizes.’

‘But who is to give the prizes?’ quite a lot of voices asked.

‘Why, SHE, of course,’ said the Dodo, pointing to Alice with one finger. The whole party at once crowded round her, calling out in a confused way, ‘Prizes! Prizes!’

Alice had no idea what to do. In despair, she put her hand in her pocket, and pulled out a box of candy (luckily the salt water had not got into it), and handed them round as prizes. There was exactly one a-piece all round.

‘But she must have a prize herself, you know,’ said the Mouse.

‘Of course,’ the Dodo replied very gravely. ‘What else have you got in your pocket?’ he went on, turning to Alice.

‘Only a broken ring,’ said Alice sadly.

Dodo presenting broken ring

‘Hand it over here,’ said the Dodo.

Then they all crowded round her once more, while the Dodo gravely presented the broken ring, saying, ‘We beg your acceptance of this beautiful ring.’ And when it had finished this short speech, they all cheered.

Alice thought the whole thing kind of crazy, but they all looked so grave that she did not dare to laugh; and, as she could not think of anything to say, she simply bowed and took the ring, looking as serious as she could.

The next thing was to eat the candy. This caused some noise and to-do, as the large birds complained that they could not taste theirs, and the small ones couldn’t get theirs to go down their throats, and had to be patted on the back.

However, it was over at last, and they sat down again in a ring, and begged the Mouse to tell them something more.

‘You promised to tell me your history, you know,’ said Alice, ‘and why it is you hate – C and D,’ she added in a whisper, half afraid its feelings would be hurt again.

‘Mine is a long and a sad tale!’ said the Mouse, turning to Alice, and letting out a long, sad sound.

‘It IS a long tail, certainly,’ said Alice, looking down with wonder at the Mouse’s tail. ‘But why do you call it sad?’ And she kept on puzzling about it while the Mouse was speaking, so that her idea of the tale was something like this:

Mouse telling story to birds and Alice

‘Fury said to a mouse, That he met in the house, “Let us both go to law: I will take YOU to court.— Come,
I’ll take no denial; we must have a trial: For really this morning I’ve nothing to do.”
Said the mouse to the Fury, “Such a trial,
dear Sir,

With no jury or judge, would be wasting our breath.”
“I’ll be judge, I’ll be jury,”
Said cunning old Fury:
“I’ll try the whole cause,
and sentence
you to death.”’

‘You are not attending!’ said the Mouse to Alice very seriously. ‘What are you thinking of?’

‘I beg your pardon,’ said Alice very humbly. ‘You had got to the fifth bend, I think?’

‘I had NOT!’ cried the Mouse, sharply and very angrily.

‘A knot!’ said Alice, always ready to make herself useful, and looking anxiously about her.’’Oh, do let me help to undo it!’

‘I shall do nothing of the sort,’ said the Mouse, getting up and walking away. ‘You hurt my feelings by talking such stuff!’

‘I didn’t mean it!’ begged poor Alice. ‘But your feelings are so easily hurt, you know!’

The Mouse only made a low sound in reply.

‘Please come back and finish your story!’ Alice called after it; and the others all joined: ‘Yes, please do!’

But the Mouse only shook its head, and walked away a little quicker.

‘What a pity it wouldn’t stay!’ said the Lory, as soon as it was quite out of sight; and an old Crab took the opportunity of saying to her daughter, ‘Ah, my dear! Let this be a lesson to you never to lose YOUR temper!’

‘Hold your tongue, Ma!’ said the young Crab, a little angrily. ‘You’re enough to try the patience of an oyster!’

‘I wish I had our Dinah here, I know I do!’ said Alice aloud, addressing nobody especially. ‘She’d soon bring it back!’

‘And who is Dinah, if I might ask,’ said the Lory.

Alice replied eagerly, for she was always ready to talk about her pet: ‘Dinah’s our cat. And she’s such a capital one for catching mice you can’t think! And oh, I wish you could see her after the birds! Why, she’ll eat a little bird as soon as look at it!’

This speech caused quite a stir among the party. Some of the birds hurried off at once. An old Magpie began wrapping itself up very carefully, remarking, ‘I really must be getting home; the night-air doesn’t suit my throat!’ And a Canary called out in a trembling voice to its children, ‘Come away, my dears! It’s high time you were all in bed!’

Using various excuses, they all moved off, and Alice was soon left alone.

‘I wish I hadn’t mentioned Dinah!’ she said to herself sadly. ‘Nobody seems to like her down here, and I’m sure she’s the best cat in the world! Oh, my dear Dinah! I wonder if I shall ever see you any more!’

And here poor Alice began to cry again, for she felt very lonely and low in her feelings. In a little while, however, she again heard the little pat-pat of footsteps in the distance.

She looked up eagerly, half hoping that the Mouse had changed his mind, and was coming back to finish his story.

OceanofPDF.com

CHAPTER IV

THE RABBIT SENDS IN A LITTLE BILL

It was the White Rabbit, coming slowly back again, and looking anxiously about as it went, as if it had lost something; and she heard it muttering to itself:

‘The Duchess! The Duchess! Oh my dear paws! Oh my fur and whiskers! She’ll have me killed, as sure as cats are cats! Where CAN I have dropped them, I wonder?’

Alice guessed in a moment that it was looking for the fan and the pair of white kid gloves, and she very good-naturedly began hunting about for them,

But they were nowhere to be seen – everything seemed to have changed since her swim in the pool. And the great hall, with the glass table and the little door, had disappeared completely.

Very soon the Rabbit noticed Alice as she went hunting about, and called out to her angrily, ‘Why, Mary Ann, what ARE you doing out here? Run home this moment, and get me a pair of gloves and a fan! Quick!’

Alice was so afraid that she ran off at once in the direction it pointed to, without trying to explain the mistake the Rabbit had made.

‘He took me for his house-maid,’ she said to herself as she ran. ‘How surprised he’ll be when he finds out who I am! But I’d better take him his fan and gloves – that is, if I can find them.’

As she said this, she came upon a neat little house, on the door of which was a bright metal plate with the name ‘W. RABBIT’ upon it.

She went in without knocking and hurried up the stairs in great fear lest she should meet the real Mary Ann, and be turned out of the house before she had found the fan and gloves.

‘How queer it seems,’ Alice said to herself, ‘to be going messages for a rabbit! I suppose Dinah will be sending me on messages next!’

And she began fancying the sort of thing that would happen: ‘“Miss Alice! Come here directly, and get ready for your walk!”

‘“Coming in a minute, nurse! But I’ve got to see that the mouse doesn’t get out.”

‘Only I don’t think,’ Alice went on, ‘that they’d let Dinah in the house if it began ordering people about like that!’

By this time she had found her way into a clean little room with a table in the window, and on it (as she had hoped) a fan and two or three pairs of tiny white kid gloves.

She took up the fan and a pair of the gloves, and was just going to leave the room, when her eye fell upon a little bottle that stood near the looking-glass.

There was no label this time with the words ‘DRINK ME,’ but nevertheless she took the top off and put it to her lips.

‘I know SOMETHING interesting is sure to happen,’ she said to herself, ‘whenever I eat or drink anything; so I’ll just see what this bottle does. I do hope it’ll make me grow large again, for really I’m quite tired of being such a tiny little thing!’

It did so indeed, and much sooner than she had expected. Before she had drunk half the bottle, she found her head pressing against the ceiling, and had to bend down to save her neck from being broken.

She quickly put bottle down, saying to herself, ‘That’s quite enough – I hope I shan’t grow any more. As it is, I can’t get out the door. I wish I hadn’t drunk quite so much!’

Alas! It was too late to wish that! She went on growing, and growing, and very soon had to kneel down on the floor. In another minute there was not even room for this, and she tried lying down with one elbow against the door, and the other arm curled round her head.

Still she went on growing. As a last thing to try, she put one arm out of the window, and one foot up the chimney, and said to herself, ‘Now I can do no more, whatever happens. What WILL become of me?’

Luckily for Alice, the little bottle had now had its full effect, and she grew no larger. Still it was very uncomfortable, and, as there seemed to be no sort of chance of her ever getting out of the room again, no wonder she felt unhappy.

Alice in the Rabbit's house

'It was much pleasanter at home,' thought poor Alice, 'when one wasn't always growing larger and smaller, and being ordered about by mice and rabbits. I almost wish I hadn't gone down that rabbit-hole – and yet – and yet – it's rather curious, you know, this sort of life!

'I do wonder what CAN have happened to me! When I used to read children's stories when I was young, I fancied that kind of thing never happened, and now here I am in the middle of one!

'There ought to be a book written about me, that there ought! And when I grow up, I'll write one – but I'm grown up now,' she added sadly. 'At least there's no room to grow up any more HERE.'

'But then,' thought Alice, 'shall I NEVER get any older than I am now? That'll be a comfort one way – never to be an old woman. But then – always to have lessons to learn! Oh, I shouldn't like THAT!'

'Oh, you foolish Alice!' she answered herself. 'How can you learn lessons in here? Why, there's hardly room for YOU, and no room at all for any lesson-books!'

And so she went on, taking first one side and then the other, and making quite a conversation of it altogether. But after a few minutes she heard a voice outside, and stopped to listen.

'Mary Ann! Mary Ann!' said the voice. 'Bring me my gloves this moment!' Then came the little pat-pat of feet on the stairs.

Alice knew it was the Rabbit coming to look for her, and she trembled till she shook the house, quite forgetting that she was now about a thousand times as large as the Rabbit, and had no reason to be afraid of it.

Soon the Rabbit came up to the door and tried to open it. But, as the door opened inwards, and Alice's elbow was pressed hard against it, that attempt proved a failure.

Alice heard it say to itself, 'Then I'll go round and get in at the window.'

'THAT you won't,' thought Alice, and, after waiting till she fancied she heard the Rabbit just under the window, she suddenly spread out her hand, and tried to grasp it.

She did not get hold of anything, but she heard a little cry and a fall, and a crash of broken glass, from which she concluded that it was just possible the Rabbit had fallen into a garden frame, or something of the sort.

Next came an angry voice – the Rabbit's – 'Pat! Pat! Where are you?' And then a voice she had never heard before.

'Sure then I'm here! Digging for apples, your honor!'

'Digging for apples, indeed!' said the Rabbit angrily. 'Here! Come and help me out of THIS!' (Sounds of more broken glass.)

'Now tell me, Pat, what's that in the window?'

Alice's hand grasping in the air

'Sure, it's an arm, your honor!'

‘An arm, you goose! Who ever saw one that size? Why, it fills the whole window!’

‘Sure, it does, your honor: but it’s an arm for all that.’

‘Well, it’s got no business there, at any rate. Go and take it away!’

There was a long silence after this, and Alice could only hear whispers now and then; such as, ‘Sure, I don’t like it, your honor, at all, at all!’

‘Do as I tell you, you coward!’

At last she spread out her hand again, and made another grasp in the air. This time there were TWO little cries, and more sounds of broken glass.

‘What a number of garden frames there must be!’ thought Alice. ‘I wonder what they’ll do next! As for pulling me out of the window, I only wish they COULD! I’m sure I don’t want to stay in here any longer!’

She waited for some time without hearing anything more. At last came a sound of little wheels, and the sound of a good many voices all talking together.

She made out the words: ‘Where’s the other ladder?’

‘Why, I hadn’t to bring but one; Bill’s got the other.’

‘Bill! Bring it here, lad! – Here, put them up at this corner. – No, tie them together first – they don’t reach half high enough yet. – Oh! They’ll do well enough; don’t be particular. – Here, Bill! Catch hold of this rope’

‘Will the roof bear? – Mind that loose slate. – Oh, it’s coming down! Heads below!’ (a loud crash).

‘Now, who did that?’

‘It was Bill, I fancy.’

“There goes Bill!”

‘Who’s to go down the chimney?’

‘Nay, I shall not! YOU do it!’

‘That I won’t, then! – Bill’s to go down.’

‘Here, Bill! the master says you’re to go down the chimney!’

‘Oh! So Bill’s got to come down the chimney, has he?’ said Alice to herself. ‘They seem to put everything upon Bill! I wouldn’t be in Bill’s place for a good deal. This fire-place is narrow, to be sure; but I THINK I can kick a little!’

She drew her foot as far down the chimney as she could, and waited till she heard a little animal (she couldn’t guess of what sort it was) scratching and scrambling about in the chimney close above her.

Then, saying to herself, ‘This is for Bill,’ she gave one sharp kick, and waited to see what would happen next.

The first thing she heard was a shout of ‘There goes Bill!’ Then the Rabbit’s voice: ‘Catch him, you by the hedge!’ Then silence, and then another mix of voices: ‘Hold up his head – Brandy now – Don’t choke him – How was it, old fellow? What happened to you? Tell us all about it!’

Last came a little weak, high voice, (‘That’s Bill,’ thought Alice,) ‘Well, I hardly know – No more, thank you; I’m better now – but I’m a deal too up-set to tell you – all I know is, something comes at me like a Jack-in-the-box, and up I goes like a sky-rocket!’

‘So you did, old fellow!’ said the others.

‘We must burn the house down!’ said the Rabbit’s voice; and Alice called out as loud as she could, ‘If you do. I’ll set Dinah at you!’

There was a dead silence instantly, and Alice thought to herself, ‘I wonder what they WILL do next! If they had any sense, they’d take the roof off.’

After a minute or two, they began moving about again, and Alice heard the Rabbit say, ‘One load will do, to begin with.’

‘One load of WHAT?’ thought Alice.

But she had not long to doubt, for the next moment a shower of little stones came in at the window, and some of them hit her in the face.

‘I’ll put a stop to this,’ she said to herself, and shouted out, ‘You’d better not do that again!’ which produced another dead silence.

Alice noticed with some surprise that the stones were all turning into little cakes as they lay on the floor, and a bright idea came into her head.

‘If I eat one of these cakes,’ she thought, ‘it’s sure to make SOME change in my size; and as it can’t possibly make me larger, it must make me smaller, I suppose.’

So she ate one of the cakes, and was delighted to find that she began growing smaller at once.

As soon as she was small enough to get through the door, she ran out of the house, and found quite a crowd of little animals and birds waiting outside.

The poor little Lizard, Bill, was in the middle, being held up by two Guinea-pigs, who were giving it something out of a bottle.

They all made a rush at Alice the moment she appeared; but she ran off as hard as she could, and soon found herself safe in a thick wood.

‘The first thing I’ve got to do,’ said Alice to herself, as she wandered about in the wood, ‘is to grow to my right size again; and the second thing is to find my way into that lovely garden. I think that will be the best plan.’

It sounded like an excellent plan, and very neatly and simply arranged. The only difficulty was that she had not the smallest idea how to set about it.

While she was looking about anxiously among the trees, a little sharp bark just over her head made her look up. A huge Puppy was looking down at her with large round eyes, and stretching out one paw, trying to touch her.

‘Poor little thing!’ said Alice.

She tried to whistle to it, but she was terribly afraid all the time that it might be hungry, in which case it would very likely eat her up no matter how nice she was.

Hardly knowing what she did, she picked up a little stick, and held it out to the Puppy. The Puppy jumped into the air and, with a cry of delight, rushed at the stick and made believe to worry it.

Alice ran behind a bush to keep herself from being knocked over; but the moment she appeared on the other side, the Puppy made another rush at the stick.

Dog looking at tiny Alice

Alice, thinking it was very like having a game of play with a cart-horse, and expecting every moment to be stepped on, ran round the bush again.

Then the Puppy began a series of short charges at the stick, running a very little way forwards each time and a long way back, and barking loudly all the while.

At last it sat down a good way off, out of breath, with its tongue hanging out of its mouth and its great eyes half shut.

This seemed to Alice a good opportunity for making her escape; so she set off at once, and ran till she was quite tired and out of breath, till the Puppy's bark sounded far off.

'And yet what a dear little puppy it was!' said Alice, as she leant against a butter-cup to rest herself, and fanned herself with one of the leaves.

'I should have liked teaching it tricks very much, if – if I'd only been the right size to do it! Oh dear! I'd nearly forgotten that I've got to grow up again! Let me see – how IS it to be managed? I suppose I ought to eat or drink something or other; but the great question is, what?'

The great question certainly was, what?

Alice looked all round her at the flowers and the tall grass, but she did not see anything that looked like the right thing to eat or drink under the circumstances.

There was a large mushroom growing near her, about the same height as herself; and when she had looked under it, and on both sides of it, and behind it, it occurred to her that she might as well look and see what was on the top.

She stretched herself up and looked over the edge. Her eyes immediately met those of a large Caterpillar. It was sitting on the top with its arms folded, quietly smoking a long pipe, and taking not the smallest notice of her or of anything else.

OceanofPDF.com

CHAPTER V

ADVICE FROM A CATERPILLAR

The Caterpillar and Alice looked at each other for some time in silence. At last the Caterpillar took the pipe out of its mouth, and addressed her in a tired, sleepy voice.

‘Who are YOU?’ said the Caterpillar.

This was not an encouraging opening for a conversation. Alice replied, rather tongue-tied, ‘I – I hardly know, sir, just at present. At least I know who I WAS when I got up this morning, but I think I must have been changed several times since then.’

‘What do you mean by that?’ said the Caterpillar gravely. ‘Explain yourself!’

‘I can’t explain MYSELF, I’m afraid, sir’ said Alice, ‘because I’m not myself, you see.’

‘I don’t see,’ said the Caterpillar.

‘I’m afraid I can’t put it more clearly,’ Alice replied very politely, ‘for I can’t understand it myself to begin with; and being so many different sizes in a day mixes me up.’

Alice meets the Caterpillar.

‘It doesn’t,’ said the Caterpillar.

‘Well, perhaps you haven’t found it so yet,’ said Alice. ‘But when you turn into something else – you will some day, you know – and then after that into a butterfly, I should think you’ll feel it a little queer, won’t you?’

‘Not a bit,’ said the Caterpillar.

‘Well, perhaps your feelings may be different,’ said Alice. ‘All I know is, it would feel very queer to ME.’

‘You!’ said the Caterpillar, looking down its nose at her. ‘Who are YOU?’

Which brought them back again to the beginning of the conversation. Alice felt a little angry at the Caterpillar’s making such VERY short remarks, and she drew herself up and said, very gravely, ‘I think, you ought to tell me who YOU are, first.’

‘Why?’ said the Caterpillar.

Here was another puzzling question; and as Alice could not think of any good reason, and as the Caterpillar seemed to be in a VERY unpleasant state of mind, she turned away.

‘Come back!’ the Caterpillar called after her. ‘I’ve something important to say!’

This sounded promising, certainly: Alice turned and came back again.

‘Keep your temper,’ said the Caterpillar.

‘Is that all?’ said Alice, holding back her anger as well as she could.

‘No,’ said the Caterpillar.

Alice thought she might as well wait, as she had nothing else to do, and perhaps after all it might tell her something worth hearing.

For some minutes the Caterpillar smoked on the pipe without speaking, but at last it unfolded its arms, took the pipe out of its mouth again, and said, ‘So you think you’re changed, do you?’

‘I’m afraid I am, sir,’ said Alice. ‘I can’t remember things as I used – and I don’t keep the same size for ten minutes together!’

‘Can’t remember WHAT things?’ said the Caterpillar.

‘Well, I’ve tried to say “HOW DOES THE LITTLE BUSY BEE,” but it all came different!’ Alice replied in a very sad voice.

‘Repeat, “YOU ARE OLD, FATHER WILLIAM,”’ said the Caterpillar.

Alice folded her hands, and began:

‘You are old, Father William,’ the young man said,

‘And your hair has become very white;

And yet you always stand on your head –

Do you think, at your age, it is right?’

‘In my youth,’ Father William replied to his son,

Father William standing on his head

‘I feared it might damage the brain;
But, now that I’m perfectly sure I have none,
Why, I do it again and again.’

‘You are old,’ said the youth, ‘as I mentioned before,
And have grown most unusually fat;
Yet you did a turn-over coming in at the door—
Pray, what is the reason of that?’

‘In my youth,’ said the man, as he shook his gray locks,
‘I kept all my arms and my legs very supple
By the use of this cream – one penny the box –
Allow me to sell you a couple?’

‘You are old,’ said the youth, ‘and your teeth are too weak
For anything tougher than suet;
Yet you finished the goose, with the bones and the beak –
Pray how did you manage to do it?’

‘In my youth,’ said his father, ‘I took to the law,
And argued each case with my wife;
And the very great strength, which it gave to my jaw,
Has lasted the rest of my life.’

‘You are old,’ said the youth, ‘one would hardly suppose
That your eye was as steady as ever;
Yet you balanced an eel on the end of your nose –
What made you so awfully clever?’

‘I have answered three questions, and that is enough,’

Said his father; ‘don’t give yourself airs!

Do you think I can listen all day to such stuff?

Be off, or I’ll kick you down stairs!’

‘That is not said right,’ said the Caterpillar.

‘Not QUITE right, I’m afraid,’ said Alice fearfully. ‘Some of the words have got altered.’

‘It is wrong from beginning to end,’ said the Caterpillar firmly, and there was silence for some minutes.

The Caterpillar was the first to speak.

‘What size do you want to be?’ it asked.

‘Oh, I’m not particular as to size,’ Alice replied; ‘only one doesn’t like changing so often, you know.’

‘I DON’T know,’ said the Caterpillar.

Alice said nothing. She had never been so much argued with in her life before, and she felt that she was losing her temper.

‘Are you content now?’ said the Caterpillar.

‘Well, I should like to be a LITTLE larger, sir, if you wouldn’t mind,’ said Alice. ‘Three inches is such a terrible height to be.’

‘It is a very good height indeed!’ said the Caterpillar angrily, sitting up as straight as it could as it spoke (it was exactly three inches high).

‘But I’m not used to it!’ said poor Alice in a tone to be pitied. And she thought to herself, ‘I wish the creatures wouldn’t have their feelings so easily hurt!’

‘You’ll get used to it in time,’ said the Caterpillar; and it put the pipe into its mouth and began smoking again.

This time Alice waited patiently until it chose to speak again. But in a minute or two the Caterpillar took the pipe out of its mouth, opened its mouth once or twice, and shook itself. Then it got down off the mushroom, and wound away in the grass, merely remarking as it went:

‘One side will make you grow taller, and the other side will make you grow shorter.’

‘One side of WHAT? The other side of WHAT?’ thought Alice to herself.

‘Of the mushroom,’ said the Caterpillar, as if she had asked it aloud; and in another moment it was out of sight.

Alice stared thoughtfully at the mushroom for a minute, trying to make out which were the two sides of it. As it was perfectly round, she found this a very difficult question.

At last, however, she put her arms round the mushroom as far as they would go, and broke off a bit of the edge with each hand.

‘And now which is which?’ she said to herself.

She took a bite of the right-hand bit to try the effect. The next moment she felt a hard blow beneath her chin. It had struck her foot!

This sudden change made her very fearful, and she felt there was no time to be lost, as she was growing smaller very rapidly.

She set to work at once to eat some of the other bit, but her chin was pressed so closely against her foot there was hardly room to open her mouth.

She managed to get her mouth open at last and take a bite of the left-hand bit.

‘Come, my head’s free at last!’ said Alice in a tone of delight, which changed into fear in another moment when she found that her shoulders were nowhere to be found.

All she could see, when she looked down, was a huge length of neck, which seemed to rise out of a sea of green leaves that lay far below her.

‘What CAN all that green stuff be?’ said Alice. ‘And where HAVE my shoulders got to? And oh, my poor hands, how is it I can’t see you?’

She was moving them about as she spoke, but no result seemed to follow, except a little shaking among the distant green leaves.

As there seemed to be no chance of getting her hands up to her head, she tried to get her head down to them, and was delighted to find that her neck would turn about easily in any direction.

She had just succeeded in curving it down, and was going to stick her head in among the leaves, which she found to be nothing but the tops of the trees under which she had been wandering, when a sharp noise made her draw back in a hurry.

A large bird had flown into her face, and was beating her with its wings.

‘Serpent!’ screamed the Pigeon.

‘I’m NOT a Serpent!’ said Alice angrily. ‘Let me alone!’

‘Serpent, I say again!’ repeated the Pigeon, but more quietly, and added with a kind of tear in its voice, ‘I’ve tried every way, and nothing seems to suit them!’

‘I haven’t the least idea what you’re talking about,’ said Alice.

‘I’ve tried the roots of trees, and I’ve tried banks, and I’ve tried bushes,’ the Pigeon went on, without attending to her; ‘but those serpents! There’s no pleasing them!’

Alice was more and more puzzled, but she thought there was no use in saying anything more till the Pigeon had finished.

‘As if it wasn’t trouble enough hatching the eggs,’ said the Pigeon; ‘but I must be on the look-out for serpents night and day! Why, I haven’t had a bit of sleep these three weeks!’

‘I’m very sorry you’ve been made up-set,’ said Alice, who was beginning to see its meaning.

‘And just as I’d taken the highest tree in the wood,’ continued the Pigeon, raising its voice to a shout, ‘and just as I was thinking I should be free of them at last, they must needs come down from the sky! Ugh, Serpent!’

‘But I’m NOT a serpent, I tell you!’ said Alice. ‘I’m a – I’m a – ‘

‘Well! WHAT are you?’ said the Pigeon. ‘I can see you’re trying to make something up!’

‘I – I’m a little girl,’ said Alice, rather doubtfully, as she remembered the number of changes she had gone through that day.

‘A likely story indeed!’ said the Pigeon in a tone of the deepest anger. ‘I’ve seen a good many little girls in my time, but never ONE with such a neck as that! No, no! You’re a serpent; and there’s no use denying it. I suppose you’ll be telling me next that you never tasted an egg!’

‘I HAVE tasted eggs, certainly,’ said Alice, who was a very truthful child; ‘but little girls eat eggs quite as much as serpents do, you know.’

‘I don’t believe it,’ said the Pigeon; ‘but if they do, why then they’re a kind of serpent, that’s all I can say.’

This was such a new idea to Alice, that she was quite silent for a minute or two, which gave the Pigeon the opportunity of adding, ‘You’re looking for eggs, I know THAT well enough; and what does it matter to me whether you’re a little girl or a serpent?’

‘It matters a good deal to ME,’ said Alice quickly; ‘but I’m not looking for eggs, as it happens; and if I was, I shouldn’t want YOURS: I don’t like them not cooked.’

‘Well, be off, then!’ said the Pigeon in a hurt tone, as it settled down again.

Alice bent down among the trees as well as she could, for her neck kept getting caught among the branches, and every now and then she had to stop and get it free.

After a while she remembered that she still held the pieces of mushroom in her hands, and she set to work very carefully, taking a bite first at one and then at the other, and growing sometimes taller and sometimes shorter, until she had succeeded in bringing herself down to her usual height.

It was so long since she had been anything near the right size, that it felt quite strange at first; but she got used to it in a few minutes, and began talking to herself, as usual.

‘Come, there’s half my plan done now! How puzzling all these changes are! I’m never sure what I’m going to be, from one minute to another! However, I’ve got back to my right size. The next thing is to get into that beautiful garden – how IS that to be done, I wonder?’

As she said this, she came suddenly upon an open place, with a little house in it about four feet high.

‘ Whoever lives there,’ thought Alice, ‘it’ll never do to come upon them THIS size. Why, I should frighten them out of their minds!’

So she began taking a bite at the right-hand bit again, and did not go near the house till she had brought herself down to nine inches high.

OceanofPDF.com

CHAPTER VI

PIG AND PEPPER

For a minute or two she stood looking at the house, and wondering what to do next, when suddenly a foot-man came running out of the wood – (she considered him to be a foot-man because he was dressed as a foot-man: otherwise, judging by his face only, she would have called him a fish) – and knocked loudly at the door with his hands.

It was opened by another foot-man dressed as a foot-man, with a round face, and large eyes like a frog; and both foot-men, Alice noticed, had powdered hair that curled all over their heads. She felt very curious to know what it was all about, and moved a little way out of the wood to listen.

Fish and Frog servants

The Fish-Foot-man began by producing from under his arm a great letter, nearly as large as himself, and this he handed over to the other, saying, in a serious voice, ‘For the Duchess. An invitation from the Queen to play croquet.’

The Frog-Foot-man repeated, in the same serious voice, only changing the order of the words a little: ‘From the Queen. An invitation for the Duchess to play. croquet.’

Then they both bowed low, and their curls got caught up together.

Alice laughed so much at this, that she had to run back into the wood for fear of their hearing her; and when she next looked out the Fish-Footman was gone, and the other was sitting on the ground near the door, staring dully up into the sky.

Alice went fearfully up to the door, and knocked.

‘There’s no sort of use in knocking,’ said the Foot-man, ‘and that for two reasons. First, because I’m on the same side of the door as you are; secondly, because they’re making such a noise inside, no one could possibly hear you.’

And certainly there was a most strange noise going on within – a constant shouting and sneezing, and every now and then a great crash, as if a dish or kettle had been broken to pieces.

‘Please, then,’ said Alice, ‘how am I to get in?’

‘There might be some sense in your knocking,’ the Foot-man went on without attending to her, ‘if we had the door between us. For instance, if you were INSIDE, you might knock, and I could let you out, you know.’

He was looking up into the sky all the time he was speaking, and this Alice thought decidedly not polite. ‘But perhaps he can’t help it,’ she said to herself; ‘his eyes are so VERY nearly at the top of his head. But at any rate he might answer questions.’

‘How am I to get in?’ she repeated aloud.

‘I shall sit here,’ the Foot-man remarked, ‘till tomorrow –’

At this moment the door of the house opened, and a large plate came sailing out, straight at the Foot-man’s head. It just missed his nose, and broke to pieces against one of the trees behind him.

‘– or next day, maybe,’ the Footman continued in the same voice, exactly as if nothing had happened.

‘How am I to get in?’ asked Alice again, in a louder voice.

‘ARE you to get in at all?’ said the Foot-man. ‘That’s the first question, you know.’

It was, no doubt: only Alice did not like to be told so. ‘It’s really terrible,’ she said to herself, ‘the way all the creatures argue. It’s enough to drive one mad!’

The Foot-man seemed to think this a good opportunity for repeating his remark, with changes. ‘I shall sit here,’ he said, ‘on and off, for days and days.’

‘But what am I to do?’ said Alice.

‘Anything you like,’ said the Foot-man, and began whistling.

‘Oh, there’s no use in talking to him,’ said Alice. ‘He’s perfectly crazy!’ And she opened the door and went in.

The door led right into a large kitchen, which was full of smoke from one end to the other. The Duchess was sitting on a three-legged stool in the middle, nursing a baby; the cook was leaning over the fire, stirring a large pot which seemed to be full of soup.

‘There’s certainly too much pepper in that soup!’ Alice said to herself, as well as she could for sneezing.

There was certainly too much of it in the air. Even the Duchess sneezed from time to time; and as for the baby, it was taking turns sneezing and crying without a moment’s pause. The only things in the kitchen that did not sneeze were the cook, and a large cat that was sitting by the fire-place and smiling from ear to ear.

Cook, Duchess, Cheshire Cat, Baby, and Alice

‘Please would you tell me,’ said Alice, a little fearfully, for she was not quite sure whether it was good manners for her to speak first, ‘why does your cat smile like that?’

‘It’s a Cheshire cat,’ said the Duchess, ‘and that’s why. Pig!’

She said the last word with such sudden anger that Alice quite jumped; but she saw in another moment that it was addressed to the baby, and not to her, so she took courage, and went on again:

‘I didn’t know that Cheshire cats always smiled; in fact, I didn’t know that cats COULD smile.’

‘They all can,’ said the Duchess; ‘and most of them do.’

‘I don’t know of any that do,’ Alice said very politely, feeling quite pleased to have got into a conversation.

‘You don’t know much,’ said the Duchess; ‘and that’s a fact.’

Alice did not at all like the way she said this, and thought it would be as well to introduce some other subject of conversation.

While she was trying to fix on one, the cook took the pot of soup off the fire, and at once set to work throwing everything within her reach at the Duchess and the baby – the fire-irons came first; then followed a shower of sauce-pans, plates, and dishes.

The Duchess took no notice of them, even when they hit her; and the baby was crying so much already, that it was quite impossible to say whether the blows hurt it or not.

‘Oh, PLEASE mind what you’re doing!’ cried Alice, jumping up and down in terror. ‘Oh, there goes his PRECIOUS nose’; as an unusually large sauce-pan flew close by it, and very nearly carried it off.

‘If everybody minded their own business,’ the Duchess barked, ‘the world would go round a deal faster than it does.’

‘Which would NOT be an advantage,’ said Alice, who felt very glad to get an opportunity of showing off a little of her knowledge. ‘Just think of what work it would make with the day and night! You see the earth takes twenty-four hours to turn round on its axis –’

‘Talking of axes,’ said the Duchess, ‘cut off her head!’

Alice glanced rather anxiously at the cook to see if she meant to do what the Duchess ordered; but the cook was busily stirring the soup, and seemed not to be listening. So Alice went on again: ‘Twenty-four hours, I THINK; or is it twelve? I –’

‘Oh, you’re getting on MY nerves,’ said the Duchess; ‘I never could stand figures!’ And with that she began nursing her child again, singing a sort of lullaby to it as she did so, and giving it a shake at the end of every line:

‘Speak roughly to your little boy,

And beat him when he sneezes:

He only does it to annoy,

Because he knows it teases.’

CHORUS.

(In which the cook and the baby joined):—

‘Wow! wow! wow!’

While the Duchess sang the second part of the song, she kept throwing the baby up and down, and the poor little thing cried so, that Alice could hardly hear the words:

‘I speak severely to my boy,

I beat him when he sneezes;

For he can thoroughly enjoy

The pepper when he pleases!’

CHORUS.

‘Wow! wow! wow!’

‘Here! You may nurse it a bit, if you like!’ the Duchess said to Alice, throwing the baby at her as she spoke. ‘I must go and get ready to play croquet with the Queen,’ and she hurried out of the room. The cook threw a frying-pan after her as she went out, but it just missed her.

Alice caught the baby with some difficulty, as it was a strange-shaped little creature, and held out its arms and legs in all directions, ‘just like a star-fish,’ thought Alice.

The poor little thing was making sounds like a steam-engine when she caught it, and kept doubling itself up and straightening itself out again, so that altogether, for the first minute or two, it was as much as she could do to hold it.

As soon as she had made out the proper way of nursing it (which was to twist it up into a sort of knot, and then keep tight hold of its right ear and left foot, so as to prevent its freeing itself), she carried it out into the open air.

‘IF I don’t take this child away with me,’ thought Alice, ‘they’re sure to kill it in a day or two: wouldn’t it be murder to leave it behind?’

She said the last words out loud, and the little thing made a strange noise in reply (it had left off sneezing by this time).

‘Don’t make such a noise,’ said Alice; ‘that’s not at all a proper way of expressing yourself.’

The baby made the noise again, and Alice looked very anxiously into its face to see what was the matter with it. There could be no doubt that it had a VERY turned-up nose, much more like a pig nose than a real nose. Also, its eyes were getting extremely small for a baby.

Altogether, Alice did not like the look of the thing at all. ‘But perhaps it was only crying,’ she thought, and looked into its eyes again, to see if there were any tears.

No, there were no tears. ‘If you’re going to turn into a pig, my dear,’ said Alice, seriously, ‘I’ll have nothing more to do with you. Mind now!’ The poor little thing cried again (or made that strange noise, it was impossible to say which), and they went on for some while in silence.

Alice was just beginning to think to herself, ‘Now, what am I to do with this creature when I get it home?’ when it made the noise again, so loudly, that she looked down into its face in some fear.

This time there could be NO mistake about it: it was neither more nor less than a pig, and she felt that it would be quite mad for her to carry it further.

So she set the little creature down, and felt quite relieved to see it run away quietly into the wood.

‘If it had grown up,’ she said to herself, ‘it would have made a dreadfully ugly child: but it makes rather a handsome pig, I think.’ And she began thinking over other children she knew, who might do very well as pigs.

She was just saying to herself, ‘If one only knew the right way to change them –’ when she was a little startled by seeing the Cheshire Cat sitting on a branch of a tree a few yards off.

The Cat only smiled when it saw Alice. It looked good-natured, she thought. Still, it had VERY long claws and a great many teeth, so she felt that it ought to be treated with respect.

‘Cheshire Puss,’ she began, rather fearfully, as she did not at all know whether it would like the name. However, it only grinned a little wider.

‘Come, it’s pleased so far,’ thought Alice, and she went on. ‘Would you tell me, please, which way I ought to go from here?’

‘That depends a good deal on where you want to get to,’ said the Cat.

‘I don’t much care where –’ said Alice.

‘Then it doesn’t matter which way you go,’ said the Cat.

‘– so long as I get SOMEWHERE,’ Alice explained.

‘Oh, you’re sure to do that, said the Cat, ‘if you only walk long enough.’

Alice felt that this could not be denied, so she tried another question. ‘What sort of people live about here?’

‘In THAT direction,’ the Cat said, waving its right paw round, ‘lives a Hatter: and in THAT direction,’ waving the other paw, ‘lives a March Hare. Visit either you like: they’re both mad.’

‘But I don’t want to go among mad people,’ Alice remarked.

‘Oh, you can’t help that,’ said the Cat: ‘we’re all mad here. I’m mad. You’re mad.’

‘How do you know I’m mad?’ said Alice.

‘You must be,’ said the Cat, ‘or you wouldn’t have come here.’

Alice didn’t think that proved it at all. However, she went on, ‘And how do you know that you’re mad?’

‘To begin with,’ said the Cat, ‘a dog’s not mad. You grant that?’

‘I suppose so,’ said Alice.

‘Well, then,’ the Cat went on, ‘you see, a dog growls when it’s angry, and wags its tail when it’s pleased. Now I growl when I’m pleased, and wag my tail when I’m angry. Therefore I’m mad.’

‘I call it purring, not growling,’ said Alice.

‘Call it what you like,’ said the Cat. ‘Do you play croquet with the Queen to-day?’

‘I should like it very much,’ said Alice, ‘but I haven’t been invited yet.’

‘You’ll see me there,’ said the Cat, and disappeared.

Alice was not much surprised at this, as she was getting used to strange things happening.

While she was looking at the place where the Cat had been, it suddenly appeared again.

‘By-the-bye, what became of the baby?’ said the Cat. ‘I’d nearly forgotten to ask.’

‘It turned into a pig,’ Alice quietly said, just as if it had come back in a natural way.

‘I thought it would,’ said the Cat, and disappeared again.

Alice waited a little, half expecting to see it again, but it did not appear, and after a minute or two she walked on in the direction in which the March Hare was said to live.

‘I’ve seen hatters before,’ she said to herself. ‘The March Hare will be much the most interesting, and perhaps as this is May it won’t be terribly mad – at least not so mad as it was in March.’

As she said this, she looked up, and there was the Cat again, sitting on a branch of a tree.

‘Did you say pig, or fig?’ said the Cat.

‘I said pig,’ replied Alice; ‘and I wish you wouldn’t keep appearing and disappearing so suddenly. You make my head go round.’

‘All right,’ said the Cat; and this time it disappeared quite slowly, beginning with the end of the tail, and ending with the smile, which remained some time after the rest of it had gone.

‘Well! I’ve often seen a cat without a smile,’ thought Alice; ‘but a smile without a cat! It’s the most curious thing I ever saw in my life!’

She had not gone much farther before she came in sight of the house of the March Hare. She thought it must be the right house, because the chimneys were shaped like ears and the roof was thatched with fur.

It was so large a house, that she did not like to go nearer till she had eaten some more of the left-hand bit of mushroom, and raised herself to about two feet high.

Even then she walked up towards it rather fearfully, saying to herself, ‘Suppose it should be terribly mad after all! I almost wish I’d gone to see the Hatter instead!’

Cheshire Cat fading to a smile

OceanofPDF.com

CHAPTER VII

A MAD TEA-PARTY

There was a table set out under a tree in front of the house, and the March Hare and the Hatter were having tea at it. A Dormouse was sitting between them, fast asleep, and the other two were using it as a cushion, resting their elbows on it, and talking over its head.

‘Very uncomfortable for the Dormouse,’ thought Alice. ‘Only, as it’s asleep, I suppose it doesn’t mind.’

Alice at the Mad Hatter’s tea party

The table was a large one, but the three were all crowded together at one corner of it.

‘No room! No room!’ they cried out when they saw Alice coming.

‘There’s PLENTY of room!’ said Alice angrily, and she sat down in a large arm-chair at one end of the table.

‘Have some wine,’ the March Hare said in a pleasant voice.

Alice looked all round the table, but there was nothing on it but tea. ‘I don’t see any wine,’ she remarked.

‘There isn’t any,’ said the March Hare.

‘Then it wasn’t very nice of you to offer it,’ said Alice.

‘It wasn’t very nice of you to sit down without being invited,’ said the March Hare.

‘I didn’t know it was YOUR table,’ said Alice. ‘It’s laid for a great many more than three.’

‘Your hair wants cutting,’ said the Hatter.

He had been looking at Alice for some time with great curiosity, and this was his first speech.

‘You should learn not to make personal remarks,’ Alice said with some anger. ‘It’s not very polite.’

The Hatter opened his eyes very wide on hearing this; but all he SAID was, ‘Why is a black bird like a writing-desk?’

‘Come, we shall have some fun now!’ thought Alice. ‘I’m glad they’ve begun playing games.’

‘I believe I can guess that,’ she added aloud.

‘Do you mean that you think you can find out the answer to it?’ said the March Hare.

‘Exactly so,’ said Alice.

‘Then you should say what you mean,’ the March Hare went on.

‘I do,’ Alice quickly replied. ‘At least – at least, I mean what I say – that’s the same thing, you know.’

‘Not the same thing a bit! said the Hatter. ‘You might just as well say that “I see what I eat” is the same thing as “I eat what I see”!’

‘You might just as well say,’ added the March Hare, ‘that “I like what I get” is the same thing as “I get what I like”!’

‘You might just as well say,’ added the Dormouse, who seemed to be talking in his sleep, ‘that “I breathe when I sleep” is the same thing as “I sleep when I breathe”!’

‘It IS the same thing with you,’ said the Hatter, and here the conversation dropped, and the party sat silent for a minute, while Alice thought over all she could remember about black birds and writing-desks, which wasn’t much.

The Hatter was the first to break the silence.

‘What day of the month is it?’ he said, turning to Alice.

He had taken his watch out of his pocket, and was looking at it anxiously, shaking it every now and then, and holding it to his ear.

Alice considered a little, and then said, ‘The fourth.’

‘Two days wrong!’ said the Hatter sadly. ‘I told you butter wouldn’t suit the works!’ he added, looking angrily at the March Hare.

‘It was the BEST butter,’ the March Hare replied.

‘Yes, but some bread must have got in as well,’ the Hatter complained. ‘You shouldn’t have put it in with the bread-knife.’

The March Hare took the watch and looked at it sadly, then dipped it into his cup of tea and looked at it again. But he could think of nothing better to say than his first remark, ‘It was the BEST butter, you know.’

Alice had been looking over his shoulder with some curiosity. ‘What a funny watch!’ she remarked. ‘It tells the day of the month, and doesn’t tell what o’clock it is!’

‘Why should it?’ muttered the Hatter. ‘Does YOUR watch tell you what year it is?’

‘Of course not,’ Alice replied, ‘but that’s because it stays the same year for such a long time together.’

‘Which is just the case with MINE,’ said the Hatter.

Alice felt terribly puzzled, because the Hatter’s remark seemed to have no sort of meaning in it, and yet it was certainly English.

‘I don’t quite understand you,’ she said, as politely as she could.

‘The Dormouse is asleep again,’ said the Hatter, and he poured a little hot tea upon its nose.

The Dormouse shook its head, and said, without opening its eyes, ‘Of course, of course; just what I was going to remark myself.’

‘Have you guessed the answer yet?’ the Hatter said, turning to Alice again.

‘No, I give it up,’ Alice replied. ‘What’s the answer?’

‘I haven’t the slightest idea,’ said the Hatter.

‘Nor I,’ said the March Hare.

‘I think you might do something better with the time,’ Alice said, ‘than waste it in asking questions that have no answers.’

‘If you knew Time as well as I do,’ said the Hatter, ‘you wouldn’t talk about wasting IT. It’s HIM.’

‘I don’t know what you mean,’ said Alice.

‘Of course you don’t!’ the Hatter said, tossing his head back. ‘I dare say you never even spoke to Time!’

‘Perhaps not,’ Alice replied. ‘But I know I have to beat time when I learn music.’

‘Ah! That accounts for it,’ said the Hatter. ‘He won’t stand beating. Now, if you only kept on good terms with him, he’d do almost anything you liked with the clock. For instance, suppose it were nine o’clock in the morning, just time to begin lessons: you’d only have to whisper to Time, and round goes the clock in a flash! Half-past one, time for dinner!’

(‘I only wish it was,’ the March Hare said to itself in a whisper.)

‘That would be grand, certainly,’ said Alice thoughtfully. ‘But then – I shouldn’t be hungry for it, you know.’

‘Not at first, perhaps,’ said the Hatter/ ‘But you could keep it to half-past one as long as you liked.’

‘Is that the way YOU manage?’ Alice asked.

The Hatter shook his head sadly. ‘Not I!’ he replied. ‘We quarreled last March – just before HE went mad, you know –’ (pointing with his tea spoon at the March Hare). ‘It was at the great musical given by the Queen of Hearts, and I had to sing:

“Twinkle, twinkle, little bat!

How I wonder what you’re at!”

You know the song, perhaps?’

‘I’ve heard something like it,’ said Alice.

‘It goes on, you know,’ the Hatter continued, ‘in this way:

“Up above the world you fly,

Like a tea-tray in the sky.

Twinkle, twinkle –”’

Here the Dormouse shook itself, and began singing in its sleep, ‘Twinkle, twinkle, twinkle, twinkle –’ and went on so long that they had to pinch it to make it stop.

‘Well, I’d hardly finished the first part,’ said the Hatter, ‘when the Queen jumped up and cried out, “He’s murdering the time! Off with his head!”’

‘How terrible!’ exclaimed Alice.

‘And ever since that,’ the Hatter went on in a sad tone, ‘he won’t do a thing I ask! It’s always six o’clock now.’

A bright idea came into Alice’s head. ‘Is that the reason so many tea-things are put out here?’ she asked.

‘Yes, that’s it,’ said the Hatter. ‘It’s always tea-time, and we’ve no time to wash the things between whiles.’

‘Then you keep moving round, I suppose?’ said Alice.

‘Exactly so,’ said the Hatter: ‘as the things get used up.’

‘But what happens when you come to the beginning again?’ Alice asked.

‘Suppose we change the subject,’ the March Hare interrupted, opening its mouth wide, as if sleepy. ‘I’m getting tired of this. I vote the young lady tells us a story.’

‘I’m afraid I don’t know one,’ said Alice, made rather anxious by the proposal.

‘Then the Dormouse shall!’ they both cried. ‘Wake up, Dormouse!’ And they pinched it on both sides at once.

The Dormouse slowly opened his eyes.

‘I wasn’t sleeping,’ he said in a sleepy voice. ‘I heard every word you fellows were saying.’

‘Tell us a story!’ said the March Hare.

‘Yes, please do!’ begged Alice.

‘And be quick about it,’ added the Hatter, ‘or you’ll be asleep again before it’s done.’

‘Once upon a time there were three little sisters,’ the Dormouse began in a great hurry; ‘and their names were Elsie, Lacie, and Tillie; and they lived at the bottom of a well –’

‘What did they live on?’ said Alice, who always took a great interest in questions of eating and drinking.

‘They lived on sugar water,’ said the Dormouse, after thinking a minute or two.

‘They couldn’t have done that, you know,’ Alice gently remarked. ‘They’d have been ill.’

‘So they were,’ said the Dormouse. ‘VERY ill.’

Alice tried to fancy to herself what such a strange way of living would be like, but it puzzled her too much, so she went on:

‘But why did they live at the bottom of a well?’

‘Take some more tea,’ the March Hare said to Alice, very politely.

‘I’ve had nothing yet,’ Alice replied in a hurt tone of voice, ‘so I can’t take more.’

‘You mean you can’t take LESS,’ said the Hatter. ‘It’s very easy to take MORE than nothing.’

‘Nobody asked YOUR opinion,’ said Alice.

‘Who’s making personal remarks now?’ the Hatter asked with a tone of victory in his voice.

Alice did not quite know what to say to this; so she helped herself to some tea and bread-and-butter, and then turned to the Dormouse, and repeated her question.

‘Why did they live at the bottom of a well?’

The Dormouse again took a minute or two to think about it, and then said, ‘It was a sugar water-well.’

‘There’s no such thing!’ Alice was beginning very angrily, but the Hatter and the March Hare went, ‘Sh! sh!’ and the Dormouse angrily remarked, ‘If you can’t be nice, you’d better finish the story for yourself.’

‘No, please go on!’ Alice said very politely. ‘I won’t interrupt again. I dare say there may be ONE.’

‘One, indeed!’ said the Dormouse, drawing himself up to his full height. However, he consented to go on. ‘And so these three little sisters – they were learning to draw, you know –’

‘What did they draw?’ said Alice, quite forgetting her promise.

‘Sugar water,’ said the Dormouse, without considering at all this time.

‘I want a clean cup,’ interrupted the Hatter. ‘Let’s all move one place on.’

He moved on as he spoke, and the Dormouse followed him. The March Hare moved into the Dormouse’s place, and Alice rather unwillingly took the place of the March Hare. The Hatter was the only one who got any advantage from the change; and Alice was a good deal worse off than before, as the March Hare had just upset the milk into his plate.

Alice did not wish to offend the Dormouse again, so she began very cautiously: ‘But I don’t understand. Where did they draw the sugar water from?’

‘You can draw water out of a water-well,’ said the Hatter; ‘so I should think you could draw sugar water out of a sugar water-well – eh, stupid?’

‘But they were IN the well,’ Alice said to the Dormouse, not choosing to notice this last remark.

‘Of course they were,’ said the Dormouse; ‘– well in.’

This answer so confused poor Alice, that she let the Dormouse go on for some time without interrupting it.

‘They were learning to draw,’ the Dormouse went on, opening his mouth wide and rubbing its eyes, for it was getting very sleepy; ‘and they drew all manner of things – everything that begins with an M –’

‘Why with an M?’ said Alice.

‘Why not?’ said the March Hare.

Alice was silent.

The Dormouse had closed its eyes by this time, and was going off to sleep again. But, on being pinched by the Hatter, it woke up again with a little cry, and went on.

‘– that begins with an M, such as mouse-traps, and the moon, and memory, and muchness – you know you say things are “much of a muchness” – did you ever see such a thing as a drawing of a muchness?’

‘Really, now you ask me,’ said Alice, very much mixed up, ‘I don’t think –’

‘Then you shouldn’t talk,’ said the Hatter.

This was more than Alice could bear. She got up and walked off. The Dormouse fell asleep instantly, and neither of the others took the least notice of her going, though she looked back once or twice, half hoping that they would call after her. The last time she saw them, they were trying to put the Dormouse into the teapot.

March Hare and Mad Hatter dunking Dormouse

‘At any rate I’ll never go THERE again!’ said Alice as she picked her way through the wood. ‘It’s the worst tea-party I ever was at in all my life!’

Just as she said this, she noticed that one of the trees had a door leading right into it.

‘That’s very strange!’ she thought. ‘But everything’s strange today. I think I may as well go in at once.’

And in she went.

Once more she found herself in the long hall, and close to the little glass table. ‘Now, I’ll manage better this time,’ she said to herself, and began by taking the little golden key, and unlocking the door that led into the garden.

Then she went to work taking bites of the mushroom (she had kept a piece of it in her pocket) till she was about a foot high: then she walked through the little door: and THEN – she found herself at last in the beautiful garden, among the bright flower-beds and the cool fountains.

OceanofPDF.com

CHAPTER VIII

THE QUEEN’S CROQUET-GROUND

A large rose-tree stood near the entrance of the garden. The roses growing on it were white, but there were three gardeners at it, busily painting them red.

Alice thought this a very curious thing, and she went nearer to watch them, and just as she came up to them she heard one of them say, ‘Look out now, Five! Don’t go splashing paint over me like that!’

‘I couldn’t help it,’ said Five, in a cross tone; ‘Seven knocked my elbow.’

On which Seven looked up and said, ‘That’s right, Five! Always lay the blame on others!’

‘YOU’D better not talk!’ said Five. ‘I heard the Queen say only yesterday you deserved to have your head cut off!’

‘What for?’ said the one who had spoken first.

‘That’s none of YOUR business, Two!’ said Seven.

‘Yes, it IS his business!’ said Five, ‘and I’ll tell him – it was for bringing the cook roots instead of onions.’

Seven threw down his brush, and had just begun, ‘Well, of all the things to say –’ when his eye chanced to fall upon Alice as she stood watching them. He checked himself suddenly. The others looked round also, and all of them bowed low.

‘Would you tell me,’ said Alice, a little fearfully, ‘why you are painting those roses?’

Five and Seven said nothing, but looked at Two. Two began in a low voice,’’Why the fact is, you see, Miss, this here ought to have been a RED rose-tree, and we put a white one in by mistake; and if the Queen was to find it out, we should all have our heads cut off, you know. So you see, Miss, we're doing our best, before she comes, to –'

At this moment Five, who had been anxiously looking across the garden, called out, 'The Queen! The Queen!' and the three gardeners instantly threw themselves flat upon their faces. There was a sound of many foot-steps, and Alice looked round, eager to see the Queen.

First came ten soldiers carrying clubs. These were all shaped like the three gardeners, kind of square and flat, with their hands and feet at the corners. Next came the ten court officers. These were covered all over with diamonds, and walked two and two, as the soldiers did.

After these came the royal children. There were ten of them, and the little dears came jumping merrily along hand in hand, in couples. They were all covered with hearts. Next came the guests, mostly Kings and Queens, and among them Alice recognized the White Rabbit.

It was talking in a hurried nervous manner, smiling at everything that was said, and went by without noticing her. Then followed the Knave of Hearts, carrying the King's crown on a red pillow; and, last of all, came THE KING AND QUEEN OF HEARTS.

Alice was rather doubtful whether she ought not to lie down on her face like the three gardeners, but she could not remember ever having heard of such a rule at formal affairs; 'and besides, what would be the use of a formal affair,' thought she, 'if people had all to lie down upon their faces, so that they couldn't see it?'

So she stood still where she was, and waited.

When everyone came opposite to Alice, they all stopped and looked at her. The Queen said, in an ugly tone of voice, 'Who is this?'

She said it to the Knave of Hearts, who only bowed and smiled in reply.

'Fool!' said the Queen, tossing her head.

Turning to Alice, she went on, 'What's your name, child?'

'My name is Alice, so please your Majesty,' said Alice very politely; but she added, to herself, 'Why, they're only a pack of cards, after all. I needn't be afraid of them!'

‘And who are THESE?’ said the Queen, pointing to the three gardeners who were lying round the rose-tree. For, you see, as they were lying on their faces, and the pattern on their backs was the same as the rest of the pack, she could not tell whether they were gardeners, or soldiers, or court officers, or three of her own children.

‘How should I know?’ said Alice, surprised at her own courage. ‘It’s no business of MINE.’

The Queen turned red with fury, and, after staring at her for a moment like a wild beast, shouted, ‘Off with her head! Off –’ ‘Nonsense!’ said Alice, very loudly and in a very decided manner, and the Queen was silent.

The King laid his hand upon her arm, and fearfully said, ‘Consider, my dear: she is only a child!’

The Queen turned angrily away from him, and said to the Knave, ‘Turn them over!’

The Knave did so, very carefully, with one foot.

‘Get up!’ said the Queen, in a high, loud voice, and the three gardeners instantly jumped up, and began bowing to the King, the Queen, the royal children, and everybody else.

‘Leave off that!’ shouted the Queen. ‘You make my head go round.’ And then, turning to the rose-tree, she went on, ‘What HAVE you been doing here?’

‘May it please your Majesty,’ said Two, in a very quiet voice, going down on one knee as he spoke, ‘we were trying –’

‘I see!’ said the Queen, who had meanwhile been examining the roses. ‘Off with their heads!’ and they all moved on, three of the soldiers remaining behind to cut off the heads of the poor gardeners, who ran to Alice for protection.

‘You shall not have your heads cut off!’ said Alice, and she put them into a large flower-pot that stood near.

The three soldiers wandered about for a minute or two, looking for them, and then quietly marched off after the others.

‘Are their heads off?’ shouted the Queen.

‘Their heads are gone, if it please your Majesty!’ the soldiers shouted in reply.

‘That’s right!’ shouted the Queen. ‘Can you play croquet?’

The soldiers were silent, and looked at Alice, as the question was evidently meant for her.

‘Yes!’ shouted Alice.

‘’ome on, then!’ roared the Queen, and Alice joined the party, wondering very much what would happen next.

‘It’s – it’s a very fine day!’ said a quiet voice at her side. She was walking by the White Rabbit, who was looking anxiously into her face.

‘Very,’ said Alice: ‘– where’s the Duchess?’

‘Quiet!’ said the Rabbit in a low, hurried voice. He looked anxiously over his shoulder as he spoke, and then raised himself up on tip-toe, put his mouth close to her ear, and whispered, ‘She’s under sentence of death.’

‘What for?’ said Alice.

‘Did you say, “What a pity!”?’ the Rabbit asked.

‘No, I didn’t,’ said Alice. ‘I don’t think it’s at all a pity. I said, “What for?”’

‘She boxed the Queen’s ears –’ the Rabbit began.

Alice gave a little shout of laughter.

‘Oh, quiet!’ the Rabbit whispered fearfully. ‘The Queen will hear you! You see, she came rather late, and the Queen said –’

‘Get to your places!’ shouted the Queen in a very loud voice, and people began running about in all directions, including running up against each other. However, they got settled down in a minute or two, and the game began.

Alice thought she had never seen such a curious croquet-ground in her life. It was all hills and valleys; the balls were live hedge-hogs, the mallets live flamingoes, and the soldiers had to double themselves up and stand on their hands and feet to make the arches.

The chief difficulty Alice found at first was in managing her flamingo. She succeeded in getting its body tucked away, comfortably enough, under her arm, with its legs hanging down, but generally, just as she had got its neck nicely straightened out, and was going to give the hedgehog a blow with its head, it WOULD twist itself round and look up in her face, with such a puzzled expression that she could not help bursting out laughing.

And when she had got its head down, and was going to begin again, it was very annoying to find that the hedgehog had straightened itself out, and was in the act of crawling away. Besides all this, there was generally a hill or valley in the way wherever she wanted to send the hedgehog to, and, as the doubled-up soldiers were always getting up and walking off to other parts of the ground, Alice soon came to the conclusion that it was a very difficult game indeed.

Alice playing croquet with flamingo

The players all played at once without waiting for turns, quarrelling all the while, and fighting for the hedgehogs. In a very short time the Queen was in a fury, and went stamping about, and shouting, ‘Off with his head!’’or, ‘Off with her head!’ about once in a minute.

Alice began to feel very uncomfortable. To be sure, she had not as yet had any quarrel with the Queen, but she knew that it might happen any minute, ‘and then,’ thought she, ‘what would become of me? They’re dreadfully fond of cutting off people’s heads here. The great wonder is that there’s any one left alive!’

She was looking about for some way of escape, and wondering whether she could get away without being seen, when she noticed a curious appearance in the air. It puzzled her very much at first, but, after watching it a minute or two, she made it out to be a smile, and she said to herself, ‘It’s the Cheshire Cat. Now I shall have somebody to talk to.’

‘How are you getting on?’ said the Cat, as soon as there was mouth enough for it to speak with.

Alice waited till the eyes appeared, and then nodded.

‘It’s no use speaking to it,’ she thought, ‘till its ears have come, or at least one of them.’

In another minute the whole head appeared, and then Alice put down her flamingo, and began an account of the game, feeling very glad she had someone to listen to her.

The Cat seemed to think that there was enough of itself now in sight, and no more of it appeared.

‘I don’t think they play at all fairly,’ Alice began, in rather a complaining tone, ‘and they all quarrel so terribly one can’t hear oneself speak – and they don’t seem to have any rules in particular; at least, if there are, nobody attends to them – and you’ve no idea how confusing it is all the things being alive. For instance, there’s the arch I’ve got to go through next walking about at the other end of the ground – and I should have croqueted the Queen’s hedgehog just now, only it ran away when it saw mine coming!’

‘How do you like the Queen?’ said the Cat in a low voice.

‘Not at all,’ said Alice: ‘she’s so extremely –’

Just then she noticed that the Queen was close behind her, listening: so she went on, ‘– likely to win, that it’s hardly worth while finishing the game.’

The Queen smiled and passed on.

‘Who ARE you talking to?’ said the King, going up to Alice, and looking at the Cat’s head with great curiosity.

‘It’s a friend of mine – a Cheshire Cat,’ said Alice. ‘Allow me to introduce it.’

‘I don’t like the look of it at all,’ said the King. ‘However, it may kiss my hand if it likes.’

‘I’d rather not,’ the Cat remarked.

‘I’m to be respected,’ said the King, ‘and don’t look at me like that!’

He got behind Alice as he spoke.

‘A cat may look at a king,’ said Alice. ‘I’ve read that in some book, but I don’t remember where.’

‘Well, it must be removed,’ said the King very firmly, and he called to the Queen, who was passing at the moment, ‘My dear! I wish you would have this cat removed!’

The Queen had only one way of settling all difficulties, great or small. ‘Off with his head!’ she said, without even looking round.

‘I’ll fetch someone to cut off its head myself,’ said the King eagerly, and he hurried off.

Alice thought she might as well go back and see how the game was going on, as she heard the Queen’s voice in the distance, screaming with passion. She had already heard her sentence three of the players to have their heads cut off for having missed their turns, and she did not like the look of things at all. The game was so mixed up that she never knew whether it was her turn or not.

So she went in search of her hedgehog.

The hedgehog was engaged in a fight with another hedgehog, which seemed to Alice an excellent opportunity for croqueting one of them with the other.

The only difficulty was that her flamingo was gone across to the other side of the garden, where Alice could see it trying in a helpless sort of way to fly up into a tree.

By the time she caught the flamingo and brought it back, the fight was over, and both the hedgehogs were out of sight.

‘But it doesn’t matter much,’ thought Alice, ‘as all the arches are gone from this side of the ground.’

So she tucked the flamingo away under her arm that it might not escape again, and went back for a little more conversation with her friend.

When she got back to the Cheshire Cat, she was surprised to find quite a large crowd collected round it.

There was a quarrel going on between the man who was to cut off the Cat's head and the King, and the Queen.

They were all talking at once, while all the rest were quite silent, and looked very uncomfortable. The moment Alice appeared, she was appealed to by all three to settle the question, and they repeated their arguments to her. But, as they all spoke at once, she found it very hard indeed to make out exactly what they said.

The argument of the man who was to cut off the Cat's head was that you couldn't cut off a head unless there was a body to cut it off from: that he had never had to do such a thing before, and he wasn't going to begin at HIS time of life.

The King's argument was that anything that had a head could have it cut off, and that you weren't to talk nonsense. The Queen's argument was, that if something wasn't done about it in less than no time she'd have everybody's head cut off, all round.

The argument about cutting off the Cat's head`

(It was this last remark that had made the whole party look so grave and anxious.)

Alice could think of nothing else to say but, ‘It belongs to the Duchess: you’d better ask HER about it.’

‘She’s in prison,’ the Queen said to the man who was to cut off the Cat’s head. ‘Bring her here.’ And the man who was to cut off its head went off like an arrow.

The Cat’s head began fading away the moment he was gone, and by the time he had come back with the Duchess, it had entirely disappeared.

The King and the man who was to cut off its head ran wildly up and down looking for it, while the rest of the party went back to the game.

OceanofPDF.com

CHAPTER IX

THE MOCK TURTLE’S STORY

‘You can’t think how glad I am to see you again, you dear old thing!’ the Duchess said, as she put her arm in a friendly way into Alice’s.

And they walked off together.

Alice was very glad to find her in such a pleasant temper, and thought to herself that perhaps it was only the pepper that had made her act so badly when they met in the kitchen.

‘When I’M a Duchess,’ she said to herself, (not in a very hopeful tone though), ‘I won’t have any pepper in my kitchen AT ALL. Soup does very well without. Maybe it’s always pepper that makes people hot-tempered,’ she went on, very much pleased at having found out a new kind of rule, ‘and vinegar that makes them sour—and tea that makes them bitter – and – and sugar and such things that make children sweet-tempered. I only wish people knew that: then they wouldn’t be so stingy about it, you know –’

She had quite forgotten the Duchess by this time, and was a little startled when she heard her voice close to her ear whisper, ‘You’re thinking about something, my dear, and that makes you forget to talk. I can’t tell you just now what the moral of that is, but I shall remember it in a bit.’

‘Perhaps it hasn’t one,’ Alice remarked.

‘Don’t be foolish, child!’ said the Duchess. ‘Everything’s got a moral, if only you can find it.’ And she squeezed herself up closer to Alice’s side as she spoke.

Alice did not much like keeping so close to her: first, because the Duchess was VERY ugly; and secondly, because she was exactly the right height to rest her chin upon Alice’s shoulder, and it was an uncomfortably sharp chin. However, she wanted to be polite, so she bore it as well as she could.

‘The game’s going on rather better now,’ she said, by way of keeping up the conversation a little.

The Duchess and Alice walking arm in arm

‘So it is,’ said the Duchess.’ And the moral of that is – “Oh, ‘tis love, ‘tis love, that makes the world go round!”’

‘Somebody said,’ Alice whispered, ‘that it’s done by everybody minding their own business!’

‘Ah, well! It means much the same thing,’ said the Duchess, digging her sharp little chin into Alice’s shoulder as she added, ‘And the moral of THAT is – “Take care of the sense, and the sounds will take care of themselves.”’

‘How fond she is of finding morals in things!’ Alice thought to herself.

‘I dare say you’re wondering why I don’t put my arm round your waist,’ the Duchess said after a pause. ‘The reason is that I’m doubtful about the temper of your flamingo. Shall I try the experiment?’

‘HE might bite,’ Alice replied, not feeling at all anxious to have the experiment tried.

‘Very true,’ said the Duchess. ‘Flamingoes and mustard both bite. And the moral of that is – “Birds of a feather flock together.”’

‘Only mustard isn’t a bird,’ Alice remarked.

‘Right, as usual,’ said the Duchess. ‘What a clear way you have of putting things!’

‘It’s a mineral, I THINK,’ said Alice.

‘Of course it is,’ said the Duchess, who seemed ready to agree to everything that Alice said. ‘There’s a large mustard-mine near here. And the moral of that is – “The more there is of mine, the less there is of yours.”’

‘Oh, I know!’ exclaimed Alice, who had not attended to this last remark. ‘It’s a vegetable. It doesn’t look like one, but it is.’

‘I quite agree with you,’ said the Duchess. ‘And the moral of that is – “Be what you would seem to be” – or if you’d like it put more simply – “Never imagine yourself not to be otherwise than what it might appear to others that what you were or might have been was not otherwise than what you had been would have appeared to them to be otherwise.”’

‘I think I should understand that better,’ Alice said very politely, ‘if I had it written down: but I can’t quite follow it as you say it.’

‘That’s nothing to what I could say if I chose,’ the Duchess replied, in a pleased tone.

‘Pray don’t trouble yourself to say it any longer than that,’ said Alice.

‘Oh, don’t talk about trouble!’ said the Duchess. ‘I make you a present of everything I’ve said as yet.’

‘A cheap sort of present!’ thought Alice. ‘I’m glad they don’t give birthday presents like that!’ But she did not venture to say it out loud.

‘Thinking again?’ the Duchess asked, with another dig of her sharp little chin.

‘I’ve a right to think,’ said Alice sharply, for she was beginning to feel a little worried.

‘Just about as much right,’ said the Duchess, ‘as pigs have to fly; and the m –’

But here, to Alice’s great surprise, the Duchess’s voice died away, even in the middle of her favorite word ‘moral,’ and the arm that was linked into hers began to tremble.

Alice looked up, and there stood the Queen in front of them, with her arms folded, her face looking like a thunder-storm.

‘A fine day, your Majesty!’ the Duchess began in a low, weak voice.

‘Now, I give you fair warning,’ shouted the Queen, stamping on the ground as she spoke. ‘Either you or your head must be off, and that in about half no time! Take your choice!’

The Duchess took her choice, and was gone in a moment.

‘Let’s go on with the game,’ the Queen said to Alice; and Alice was too much afraid to say a word, but slowly followed her back to the croquet-ground.

The other guests had taken advantage of the Queen’s being absent, and were resting in the shade. However, the moment they saw her, they hurried back to the game, the Queen merely remarking that a moment’s delay would cost them their lives.

All the time they were playing the Queen never left off quarrelling with the other players, and shouting, ‘Off with his head!’ or ‘Off with her head!’

Those whom she sentenced were taken charge of by the soldiers, who of course had to leave off being arches to do this, so that by the end of half an hour or so there were no arches left, and all the players, except the King, the Queen, and Alice, were in charge of the soldiers and under sentence of death.

Then the Queen left off, quite out of breath, and said to Alice, ‘Have you seen the Mock Turtle yet?’

‘No,’ said Alice. ‘I don’t even know what a Mock Turtle is.’

‘It’s the thing Mock Turtle Soup is made from,’ said the Queen.

‘I never saw one, or heard of one,’ said Alice.

‘Come on, then,’ said the Queen, ‘and he shall tell you his history,’

As they walked off together, Alice heard the King say in a low voice, to the company generally, ‘You are all pardoned.’ ‘Come, THAT’S a good thing!’ she said to herself, for she had felt quite unhappy at the number of executions the Queen had ordered.

They very soon came upon a Gryphon, lying fast asleep in the sun. (IF you don’t know what a Gryphon is, look at the picture.)

‘Up, lazy thing!’ said the Queen, ‘and take this young lady to see the Mock Turtle, and to hear his history. I must go back and see after some heads I have ordered to be cut off.’ And she walked off, leaving Alice alone with the Gryphon.

The Gryphon asleep

Alice did not quite like the look of the creature, but on the whole she thought it would be quite as safe to stay with it as to go after that dangerous Queen: so she waited.

The Gryphon sat up and rubbed its eyes. It watched the Queen till she was out of sight, then it chuckled. ‘What fun!’ it said, half to itself, half to Alice.

‘What IS the fun?’ said Alice.

‘Why, SHE,’ said the Gryphon. ‘It’s all her fancy, that. They never executes nobody, you know. Come on!’

‘Everybody says “come on!” here,’ thought Alice, as she went slowly after it. ‘I never was so ordered about in all my life, never!’

They had not gone far before they saw the Mock Turtle in the distance, sitting sad and lonely on a little ledge of rock. As they came nearer, Alice could hear him sounding as if his heart would break. She pitied him deeply.

‘What is his sorrow?’ she asked the Gryphon, and the Gryphon answered, very nearly in the same words as before, ‘It’s all his fancy, that: he hasn’t got no sorrow, you know. Come on!’

So they went up to the Mock Turtle, who looked at them with large eyes full of tears, but said nothing.

‘This here young lady,’ said the Gryphon, ‘she wants for to know your history, she do.’

‘I’ll tell it her,’ said the Mock Turtle in a deep, hollow tone. ‘Sit down, both of you, and don’t speak a word till I’ve finished.’

So they sat down, and nobody spoke for some minutes. Alice thought to herself, ‘I don’t see how he can EVEN finish, if he doesn’t begin.’ But she waited patiently.

‘Once,’ said the Mock Turtle at last, with a deep sigh, ‘I was a real Turtle.’

These words were followed by a very long silence, broken only by an occasional cry of ‘Hjckrrh!’ from the Gryphon, and the constant heavy crying of the Mock Turtle.

Alice was very nearly getting up and saying, ‘Thank you, sir, for your interesting story,’ but she could not help thinking there MUST be more to come, so she sat still and said nothing.

‘When we were little,’ the Mock Turtle went on at last, more calmly, though still crying a little now and then, ‘we went to school in the sea. The master was an old Turtle – we used to call him Tortoise –’

‘Why did you call him Tortoise, if he wasn’t one?’ Alice asked.

‘We called him Tortoise because he taught us,’ said the Mock Turtle angrily. ‘Really, you are very dull!’

‘You ought to be ashamed of yourself for asking such a simple question,’ added the Gryphon; and then they both sat silent and looked at poor Alice, who felt ready to sink into the earth.

At last the Gryphon said to the Mock Turtle, ‘Drive on, old fellow! Don’t be all day about it!’ and the Mock Turtle went on in these words:

‘Yes, we went to school in the sea, though you may not believe it –’

‘I never said I didn’t!’ interrupted Alice.

‘You did,’ said the Mock Turtle.

‘Hold your tongue!’ added the Gryphon, before Alice could speak again.

The Mock Turtle went on.

‘We had the best of educations – in fact, we went to school every day –’

‘I’VE been to a day-school, too,’ said Alice. ‘You needn’t be so proud as all that.’

‘With extras?’ asked the Mock Turtle a little anxiously.

‘Yes,’ said Alice, ‘we learned French and music.’

‘And washing?’ said the Mock Turtle.

‘Certainly not!’ said Alice.

‘Ah! Then yours wasn’t a really good school,’ said the Mock Turtle in a tone of great relief. ‘Now, at OURS they had at the end of the bill, “French, music, AND WASHING – extra.”’

‘You couldn’t have wanted it much,’ said Alice; ‘living at the bottom of the sea.’

‘I couldn’t afford to learn it,’ said the Mock Turtle sadly. ‘I only took the regular course.’

‘What was that?’ inquired Alice.

‘Reeling and Writhing, of course, to begin with,’ the Mock Turtle replied. ‘And then the different branches of Arithmetic – Ambition, Distraction, Uglification, and Derision.’

‘I never heard of “Uglification,”’ Alice said. ‘What is it?’

The Gryphon lifted up both its paws in surprise. ‘What! Never heard of uglifying!’ it exclaimed. ‘You know what to beautify is, I suppose?’

‘Yes,’ said Alice doubtfully. ‘It means – to – make – something – prettier.’

‘Well, then,’ the Gryphon went on, ‘if you don’t know what to uglify is, you ARE a simpleton.’

Alice did not feel encouraged to ask any more questions about it, so she turned to the Mock Turtle and said, ‘What else had you to learn?’

‘Well, there was Mystery,’ the Mock Turtle replied, counting off the subjects on his flappers, ‘– Mystery, ancient and modern, with Seaography: then Drawling – the Drawling-master was an old conger-eel that used to come once a week: HE taught us Drawling, Stretching, and Fainting in Coils.’

‘What was THAT like?’ said Alice.

‘Well, I can’t show it you myself,’ the Mock Turtle said. ‘I’m too stiff. And the Gryphon never learnt it.’

‘Hadn’t time,’ said the Gryphon. ‘I went to the Classics master, though. He was an old crab, HE was.’

‘I never went to him,’ the Mock Turtle said sadly. ‘He taught Laughing and Grief, they used to say.’

‘So he did, so he did,’ said the Gryphon, also sadly, and both creatures hid their faces in their paws.

‘And how many hours a day did you do lessons?’ said Alice, in a hurry to change the subject.

‘Ten hours the first day,’ said the Mock Turtle. ‘Nine the next, and so on.’

‘What a curious plan!’ exclaimed Alice.

‘That’s the reason they’re called lessons,’ the Gryphon remarked. ‘Because they lessen from day to day.’

This was quite a new idea to Alice, and she thought it over a little before she made her next remark. ‘Then the eleventh day must have been a holiday?’

‘Of course it was,’ said the Mock Turtle.

‘And how did you manage on the twelfth?’ Alice went on eagerly.

‘That’s enough about lessons,’ the Gryphon interrupted in a very decided tone. ‘Tell her something about the games now.’

OceanofPDF.com

`CHAPTER X

THE LOBSTER QUADRILLE

The Mock Turtle took a deep breath, and drew the back of one flapper across his eyes. He looked at Alice and tried to speak, but for a minute or two cries choked his voice.

‘Same as if he had a bone in his throat,’ said the Gryphon, and it set to work shaking him and hitting him in the back.

At last the Mock Turtle recovered his voice, and, with tears running down his cheeks, he went on again:

‘You may not have lived much under the sea –’ (‘I haven’t,’ said Alice) – ‘and perhaps you were never even introduced to a lobster –’ (Alice began to say, ‘I once tasted –’ but quickly checked herself and said, ‘No, never’) ‘– so you can have no idea what a delightful thing a Lobster Quadrille is!’

‘No, indeed,’ said Alice. ‘What sort of a dance is it?’

‘Why,’ said the Gryphon, ‘you first form into a line along the sea-shore –’

‘Two lines!’ cried the Mock Turtle. ‘Seals, turtles, salmon, and so on; then, when you’ve cleared all the jelly-fish out of the way –’

‘THAT generally takes some time,’ interrupted the Gryphon.

‘– you advance twice –’

‘Each with a lobster as a partner!’ cried the Gryphon.

‘Yes,’ the Mock Turtle said. ‘Advance twice, set to partners –’

‘– change lobsters, and retire in same order,’ continued the Gryphon.

‘Then, you know,’ the Mock Turtle went on, ‘you throw the –’

‘The lobsters!’ shouted the Gryphon, with a bound into the air.

‘– as far out to sea as you can –’

‘Swim after them!’ shouted the Gryphon as loud as he could.

‘Turn over in the sea!’ cried the Mock Turtle, dancing wildly about.

‘Change lobsters again!’ shouted the Gryphon at the top of its voice.

‘Back to land again, and that’s all the first figure,’ said the Mock Turtle, suddenly dropping his voice. And the two creatures, who had been jumping about like mad things all this time, sat down again very sadly and quietly, and looked at Alice.

Mock Turtle and Gryphon showing Alice how to dance the Lobster Quadrille

‘It must be a very pretty dance,’ said Alice.

‘Would you like to see a little of it?’ said the Mock Turtle.

‘Very much indeed,’ said Alice.

‘Come, let’s try the first figure!’ said the Mock Turtle to the Gryphon. ‘We can do without lobsters, you know. Which shall sing?’

‘Oh, YOU sing,’ said the Gryphon. ‘I’ve forgotten the words.’

So they began in a very serious manner dancing round and round Alice, every now and then treading on her toes when they passed too close, and waving their fore-paws to mark the time, while the Mock Turtle sang this, very slowly and sadly:

‘“Will you walk a little faster?” said a whiting to a snail.

‘“There’s a porpoise close behind us, and he’s treading on my tail.

‘See how eagerly the lobsters and the turtles all advance!

They are waiting on the shingle — will you come and join the dance?

‘Will you, won’t you, will you, won’t you, will you join the dance?

Will you, won’t you, will you, won’t you, won’t you join the dance?

‘“You can really have no notion how delightful it will be

When they take us up and throw us, with the lobsters, out to sea!”

‘But the snail replied, “Too far, too far!” and gave a look askance —

Said he thanked the whiting kindly, but he would not join the dance.

Would not, could not, would not, could not, would not join the dance.

Would not, could not, would not, could not, could not join the dance.

‘“What matters it how far we go?” his scaly friend replied.

‘“There is another shore, you know, upon the other side.

‘The further off from England the nearer it is to France—

Then turn not pale, beloved snail, but come and join the dance.

‘Will you, won’t you, will you, won’t you, will you join the dance?

Will you, won’t you, will you, won’t you, won’t you join the dance?”’

‘Thank you, it’s a very interesting dance to watch,’ said Alice, feeling very glad that it was over at last. ‘And I do so like that curious song about the whiting!’

‘Oh, as to the whiting,’ said the Mock Turtle, ‘they – you’ve seen them, of course?’

‘Yes,’ said Alice, ‘I’ve often seen them at din –’ she checked herself just in time.

‘I don’t know where Dinn may be,’ said the Mock Turtle, ‘but if you’ve seen them so often, of course you know what they’re like.’

‘I believe so,’ Alice replied thoughtfully. ‘They have their tails in their mouths – and they’re all over bread.’

‘You’re wrong about the bread,’ said the Mock Turtle. ‘Bread would all wash off in the sea. But they HAVE their tails in their mouths; and the reason is –’

Here the Mock Turtle opened his mouth wide, as if he were tired or bored, and shut his eyes. ‘Tell her about the reason and all that,’ he said to the Gryphon.

‘The reason is,’ said the Gryphon, ‘that they WOULD go with the lobsters to the dance. So they got thrown out to sea. So they had to fall a long way. So they got their tails fast in their mouths. So they couldn’t get them out again. That’s all.’

‘Thank you,’ said Alice. ‘It’s very interesting. I never knew so much about a whiting before.’

‘I can tell you more than that, if you like,’ said the Gryphon. ‘Do you know why it’s called a whiting?’

‘I never thought about it,’ said Alice. ‘Why?’

‘IT DOES THE BOOTS AND SHOES,’ the Gryphon replied very seriously.

Alice was thoroughly puzzled. ‘Does the boots and shoes!’ she repeated in a wondering tone.

‘Why, what are YOUR shoes done with?’ said the Gryphon. ‘I mean, what makes them so shiny?’

Alice looked down at them, and considered a little before she gave her answer.

‘They’re done with blacking, I believe.’

‘Boots and shoes under the sea,’ the Gryphon went on in a deep voice, ‘are done with a whiting. Now you know.’

‘And what are they made of?’ Alice asked in a tone of great curiosity.

‘Soles and eels, of course,’ the Gryphon replied. ‘Any shrimp could have told you that.’

‘If I’d been the whiting,’ said Alice, whose thoughts were still running on the song, ‘I’d have said to the porpoise, “Keep back, please: we don’t want YOU with us!”’

‘They were obliged to have him with them,’ the Mock Turtle said. ‘No wise fish would go anywhere without a porpoise.’

‘Wouldn’t it really?’ said Alice in a tone of great surprise.

‘Of course not,’ said the Mock Turtle. ‘Why, if a fish came to ME, and told me he was going a journey, I should say “With what porpoise?”’

‘Don’t you mean “purpose”?’ said Alice.

‘I mean what I say,’ the Mock Turtle replied in a hurt tone. And the Gryphon added, ‘Come, let’s hear some of YOUR adventures.’

‘I could tell you my adventures – beginning from this morning,’ said Alice a little fearfully; ‘but it’s no use going back to yesterday, because I was a different person then.’

‘Explain all that,’ said the Mock Turtle.

‘No, no! The adventures first,’ said the Gryphon in an anxious tone. ‘Explanations take such a terrible time.’

So Alice began telling them her adventures from the time when she first saw the White Rabbit. She was a little nervous about it just at first, the two creatures got so close to her, one on each side, and opened their eyes and mouths so VERY wide, but she gained courage as she went on.

Her listeners were perfectly quiet till she got to the part about her repeating, ‘YOU ARE OLD, FATHER WILLIAM’ to the Caterpillar, and the words all coming different.

The Mock Turtle drew a long breath and said, ‘That’s very curious.’

‘It’s all about as curious as it can be,’ said the Gryphon.

‘It all came different!’ the Mock Turtle repeated thoughtfully. ‘I should like to hear her try and repeat something now. Tell her to begin.’

He looked at the Gryphon as if he thought it had some kind of authority over Alice.

‘Stand up and repeat, “IT’S THE VOICE OF THE SLUGGARD,”’ said the Gryphon.

‘How the creatures order one about, and make one repeat lessons!’ thought Alice. ‘I might as well be at school at once.’ However, she got up, and began to repeat it, but her head was so full of the Lobster Quadrille, that she hardly knew what she was saying, and the words came out very strange indeed:

‘It’s the voice of the Lobster; I heard him declare,

“You have baked me too brown, I must sugar my hair.”

As a duck with its eyelids, so he with his nose

Trims his belt and his buttons, and turns out his toes.’

‘ When the sands are all dry, he is gay as a lark,

And will talk in contemptuous tones of the Shark,

But, when the tide rises and sharks are around,

His voice has a timid and tremulous sound.’

‘That’s different from what I used to say when I was a child,’ said the Gryphon.

‘Well, I never heard it before,’ said the Mock Turtle; ‘but it sounds kind of crazy to me.’

Alice said nothing. She had sat down with her face in her hands, wondering if anything would EVER happen in a natural way again.

‘I should like to have it explained,’ said the Mock Turtle.

‘She can’t explain it,’ said the Gryphon in a hurry. ‘Go on with the next part.’

‘But about his toes?’ the Mock Turtle kept on. ‘How COULD he turn them out with his nose, you know?’

‘It’s the first position in dancing.’ Alice said. But she was terribly puzzled by the whole thing, and longed to change the subject.

‘Go on with the next part,’ the Gryphon repeated. ‘It begins, “I passed by his garden.”’

Alice did not dare to not obey it, though she felt sure it would all come wrong, and she went on in a trembling voice:

‘I passed by his garden, and marked, with one eye,

How the Owl and the Panther were sharing a pie —

The Panther took pie-crust, and gravy, and meat,

While the Owl had the dish as its share of the treat.

When the pie was all finished, the Owl, as a boon,

Was kindly permitted to pocket the spoon:

While the Panther received knife and fork with a growl,

And concluded the banquet ’

‘What IS the use of repeating all that stuff,’ the Mock Turtle interrupted, ‘if you don’t explain it as you go on? It’s by far the most confusing thing I ever heard!’

‘Yes, I think you’d better leave off,’ said the Gryphon. And Alice was only too glad to do so.

‘Shall we try another figure of the Lobster Quadrille?’ the Gryphon went on. ‘‘Or would you like the Mock Turtle to sing you a song?’

‘Oh, a song, please, if the Mock Turtle would be so kind,’ Alice replied. She said it so eagerly that the Gryphon said, in a rather hurt tone, ‘There’s no accounting for tastes! Sing her “Turtle Soup,” will you, old fellow?’

The Mock Turtle sighed deeply, and began, in a voice sometimes choked with cries, to sing this:

‘Beautiful Soup, so rich and green,

Waiting in a hot tureen!

Who for such dainties would not stoop?

Soup of the evening, beautiful Soup!

Soup of the evening, beautiful Soup!

Beau—ootiful Soo—oop!

Beau—ootiful Soo—oop!

Soo—oop of the e—e—evening,

Beautiful, beautiful Soup!

‘Beautiful Soup! Who cares for fish,

Game, or any other dish?

Who would not give all else for two

Pennyworth only of beautiful Soup?

Pennyworth only of beautiful Soup?

Beau—ootiful Soo—oop!

Beau—ootiful Soo—oop!

Soo—oop of the e—e—evening,

Beautiful, beauti—FUL SOUP!

‘Chorus again!’ cried the Gryphon, and the Mock Turtle had just begun to repeat it, when a cry of, ‘The trial’s beginning!’ was heard in the distance.

‘Come on!’ cried the Gryphon, and, taking Alice by the hand, it hurried off without waiting for the end of the song.

‘What trial is it?’ Alice asked, breathing heavily as she ran. But the Gryphon only answered, ‘Come on!’ and ran the faster, while more and more faintly came, carried on the breeze that followed them, the melancholy words:

‘Soo—oop of the e—e—evening,

Beautiful, beautiful Soup!’

OceanofPDF.com

CHAPTER XI

WHO STOLE THE TARTS?

The King and Queen of Hearts were seated on their throne when they arrived, with a great crowd gathered about them – all sorts of little birds and beasts, as well as the whole pack of cards.

The Knave was standing before them, in chains, with a soldier on each side to guard him; and near the King was the White Rabbit, with a horn in one hand, and a roll of paper in the other.

In the very middle of the court was a table, with a large dish of small cakes (tarts) upon it. They looked so good that it made Alice quite hungry to look at them.

‘I wish they’d get the trial done,’ she thought, ‘and hand round the cakes!’ But there seemed to be no chance of this, so she began looking at everything about her, to pass away the time.

Alice had never been in a court of justice before, but she had read about them in books, and she was quite pleased to find that she knew the name of nearly everything there. ‘That’s the judge,’ she said to herself, ‘because of his great wig.’

The judge, by the way, was the King; and as he wore his crown over the wig (look at the drawing in the front of the book if you want to see how he did it). He did not look at all comfortable, and it was certainly not becoming.

‘And that’s the jury-box,’ thought Alice, ‘and those twelve creatures,’ (she was obliged to say ‘creatures,’ you see, because some of them were animals, and some were birds) ‘I suppose they are the jurors.’

She said this last word two or three times over to herself, being rather proud of it: for she thought, and rightly too, that very few little girls of her age knew the meaning of it at all. However, ‘jury-men’ would have done just as well.

The twelve jurors were all very busily writing. ‘What are they doing?’ Alice whispered to the Gryphon. ‘They can’t have anything to put down yet, before the trial’s begun.’

‘They’re putting down their names,’ the Gryphon whispered in reply, ‘for fear they should forget them before the end of the trial.’

‘Stupid things!’ Alice began in a loud voice.

But she stopped quickly, for the White Rabbit cried out, ‘Silence in the court!’ and the King put on his glasses and looked anxiously round, to make out who was talking.

Alice could see, as well as if she were looking over their shoulders, that all the jurors were writing down ‘stupid things!’ She could even make out that one of them didn’t know how to spell ‘stupid, and that he had to ask his neighbor to tell him. ‘How mixed up everything will be before the trial’s over!’ thought Alice.

One of the jurors had a pencil that squeaked.

This of course, Alice could not stand, and she went round the court and got behind him, and very soon found an opportunity of taking it away.

She did it so quickly that the poor little juror (it was Bill, the Lizard) could not make out at all what had become of it; so, after hunting all about for it, he was obliged to write with one finger for the rest of the day; and this was of very little use, as it left no mark.

‘Mr. Rabbit, read the charge!’ said the King.

On this the White Rabbit blew three loud notes on the horn, opened the roll of paper, and read as follows:

‘The Queen of Hearts, she made some tarts,

All on a summer day:

The Knave of Hearts, he stole those tarts,

And took them quite away!’

‘Consider your verdict,’ the King said to the jury.

‘Not yet, not yet!’ the Rabbit quickly interrupted. ‘There’s a great deal to come before that!’

‘Call the first witness,’ said the King; and the White Rabbit blew three loud notes on the horn again, and called out, ‘First witness!’

The first witness was the Hatter. He came in with a tea-cup in one hand and a piece of bread-and-butter in the other. ‘I beg pardon, your Majesty,’ he began, ‘for bringing these in: but I hadn’t quite finished my tea when I was sent for.’

‘You ought to have finished,’ said the King. ‘When did you begin?’

The Hatter looked at the March Hare, who had followed him into the court, arm-in-arm with the Dormouse. ‘Fourteenth of March, I think it was,’ he said.

‘Fifteenth,’ said the March Hare.

‘Sixteenth,’ added the Dormouse.

‘Write that down,’ the King said to the jury, and the jury eagerly wrote down all three dates, and then added them up, and reduced the answer to quarters and pennies.

‘Take off your hat,’ the King said to the Hatter.

‘It isn’t mine,’ said the Hatter.

‘He stole the hat!’ the King exclaimed, turning to the jury, who instantly made a note of the fact.

‘I keep them to sell,’ the Hatter added as an explanation. ‘I’ve none of my own. I’m a hatter.’

Here the Queen put on her glasses and began staring at the Hatter, who turned pale and anxious.

‘Give your evidence,’ said the King; ‘and don’t be nervous, or I’ll have your head cut off on the spot.’

This did not seem to encourage the witness at all. He kept moving from one foot to the other, looking anxiously at the Queen, and in his confusion he bit a large piece out of his tea-cup instead of the bread-and-butter.

Just at this moment Alice felt something very curious happening, which puzzled her a good deal until she made out what it was. She was beginning to grow larger again. She thought at first she would get up and leave the court; but on second thoughts she decided to remain where she was as long as there was room for her.

‘I wish you wouldn’t squeeze so.’ said the Dormouse, who was sitting next to her. ‘I can hardly breathe.’

‘I can’t help it,’ said Alice very quietly. ‘I’m growing.’

‘You’ve no right to grow here,’ said the Dormouse.

‘Don’t talk like that,’ said Alice more boldly. ‘You know, you’re growing too.’

‘Yes, but I grow at a reasonable rate,’ said the Dormouse. ‘Not in that fashion.’ And he got up very angrily and crossed over to the other side of the court.

All this time the Queen had never left off staring at the Hatter, and, just as the Dormouse crossed the court, she said to one of the officers of the court, ‘Bring me the list of the singers in the last musical!’ on which the poor Hatter trembled so, that he shook both his shoes off.

‘Give your evidence,’ the King repeated angrily, ‘or I’ll have your head cut off, whether you’re anxious or not.’

‘I’m a poor man, your Majesty,’ the Hatter began, in a trembling voice, ‘– and I hadn’t begun my tea – not above a week or so – and what with the bread-and-butter getting so thin – and the twinkling of the tea –’

‘The twinkling of the what?’ said the King.

‘It began with the tea,’ the Hatter replied.

‘Of course twinkling begins with a T!’ said the King sharply. ‘Do you take me for a fool? Go on!’

‘I’m a poor man,’ the Hatter went on, ‘and most things twinkled after that – only the March Hare said –’

‘I didn’t!’ the March Hare interrupted in a great hurry.

‘You did!’ said the Hatter.

‘I deny it! said the March Hare.

‘He denies it,’ said the King. ‘Leave out that part.’

‘Well, at any rate, the Dormouse said –’

The Hatter went on, looking anxiously round to see if he would deny it too; but the Dormouse denied nothing, being fast asleep.

‘After that,’ continued the Hatter, ‘I cut more bread-and-butter –’

‘But what did the Dormouse say?’ one of the jury asked.

‘That I can’t remember,’ said the Hatter.

‘You MUST remember,’ remarked the King, ‘or I’ll have your head cut off.’

The miserable Hatter dropped his tea-cup and bread-and-butter, and went down on one knee.

‘I’m a poor man, your Majesty,’ he began.

‘You’re a very poor speaker,’ said the King.

Here one of the guinea-pigs cheered, and was immediately suppressed by the officers of the court.

(As that is rather a hard word, I will just explain to you how it was done. They had a large canvas bag, which tied up at the mouth with strings. Into this they slipped the guinea-pig, head first, and then sat upon it.)

‘I’m glad I’ve seen that done,’ thought Alice. ‘I’ve so often read in the newspapers, at the end of trials, “There was some attempts at applause, which were immediately suppressed by the officers of the court,” and I never understood what it meant till now.’

‘If that’s all you know about it, you may stand down,’ continued the King.

‘I can’t go no lower,’ said the Hatter. ‘I’m on the floor, as it is.’

‘Then you may SIT down,’ the King replied.

Here the other guinea-pig cheered, and was suppressed.

‘Come, that finished the guinea-pigs!’ thought Alice. ‘Now we shall get on better.’

‘I’d rather finish my tea,’ said the Hatter, with an anxious look at the Queen, who was reading the list of singers.

‘You may go,’ said the King, and the Hatter left the court in a hurry, without even waiting to put his shoes on.

‘– and just take his head off outside,’ the Queen added to one of the officers. But the Hatter was out of sight before the officer could get to the door.

‘Call the next witness!’ said the King.

The next witness was the Duchess’s cook. She carried the pepper-box in her hand, and Alice guessed who it was, even before she got into the court, by the way the people near the door began sneezing all at once.

‘Give your evidence,’ said the King.

‘Shall not,’ said the cook.

The King looked anxiously at the White Rabbit, who said in a low voice, ‘Your Majesty must cross-examine THIS witness.’

‘Well, if I must, I must,’ the King said, with a sad air, and, after folding his arms and staring at the cook till his eyes were nearly out of sight, he said in a deep voice, ‘What are tarts made of?’

‘Pepper, mostly’ said the cook.

‘Sugar water,’ said a sleepy voice behind her.

‘Catch that Dormouse,’ the Queen cried out. ‘Cut the head off that Dormouse! Turn that Dormouse out of court! Suppress him! Pinch him! Off with his whiskers!’

For some minutes the whole court was in an up-roar getting the Dormouse turned out, and, by the time they had settled down again, the cook had disappeared.

‘Never mind!’ said the King, with an air of great relief. ‘Call the next witness.’ And he added in an under-tone to the Queen, ‘Really, my dear, YOU must cross-examine the next witness. It quite makes my head ache!’

Alice watched the White Rabbit as he went over the list, feeling very curious to see what the next witness would be like, ‘– for they haven’t got much evidence YET,’ she said to herself.

Imagine her surprise when the White Rabbit read out, at the top of his high little voice, the name ‘Alice!’

OceanofPDF.com

CHAPTER XII

ALICE’S EVIDENCE

‘Here!’ cried Alice, quite forgetting in the to-do of the moment how large she had grown in the last few minutes. She jumped up in such a hurry that she tipped over the jury-box with the edge of her skirt, upsetting all the jury-men on to the heads of the crowd below, and there they lay all spread about, reminding her very much of a bowl of gold-fish she had, by accident, up-set the week before.

‘Oh, I BEG your pardon!’ she exclaimed, picking them up again as quickly as she could, for the accident of the goldfish kept running in her head, and she had a sort of idea that they must be collected at once and put back into the jury-box, or they would die.

‘The trial cannot proceed,’ said the King in a very grave voice, ‘until all the jury-men are back in their proper places – ALL,’ he repeated, looking hard at Alice .

Alice looked at the jury-box, and saw that, in her hurry, she had put the Lizard in head downwards, and the poor little thing was waving its tail about in a sad way, being quite unable to move.

She soon got it out again, and put it right; ‘Not that it means much,’ she said to herself. ‘I should think it would be QUITE as much use in the trial one way up as the other.’

As soon as the jury had a little recovered from the shock of being upset, and their note-books and pencils had been found and handed back to them, they set to work to write out a history of the accident, all except the Lizard, who seemed too much overcome to do anything but sit with its mouth open, gazing up into the roof of the court.

‘What do you know about this business?’ the King said to Alice.

‘Nothing,’ said Alice.

‘Nothing WHATEVER?’ asked the King.

‘Nothing whatever,’ said Alice.

‘That’s very important,’ the King said, turning to the jury. They were just beginning to write this down in their note-books, when the White Rabbit interrupted:

‘NOT important, your Majesty means, of course,’ he said in a tone of respect, but making faces at him as he spoke.

‘NOT important, of course, I meant,’ the King quickly said, and went on to himself in an undertone, ‘important – not unimportant – not important – important,’ as if he were trying which word sounded best.

Some of the jury wrote it down ‘important,’ and some ‘not important.’ Alice could see this, as she was near enough to look over their note-books.

‘But it doesn’t matter a bit,’ she thought to herself.

At this moment the King, who had been for some time busily writing in his note-book, cried out, ‘Silence!’ and read out from his book, ‘Rule Forty-two. ALL PERSONS MORE THAN A MILE HIGH TO LEAVE THE COURT.’

Everybody looked at Alice.

‘I’M not a mile high,’ said Alice.

‘You are,’ said the King.

‘Nearly two miles high,’ added the Queen.

‘Well, I shall not go, at any rate,’ said Alice. ‘Besides, that’s not a regular rule. You invented it just now.’

‘It’s the oldest rule in the book,’ said the King.

‘Then it ought to be Number One,’ said Alice.

The King turned pale, and shut his note-book quickly. ‘Consider your verdict,’ he said to the jury, in a low, trembling voice.

‘There’s more evidence to come yet, please your Majesty,’ said the White Rabbit, jumping up in a great hurry. ‘This paper has just been picked up.’

‘What’s in it?’ said the Queen.

‘I haven’t opened it yet,’ said the White Rabbit. ‘But it seems to be a letter, written by the prisoner to – to somebody.’

‘It must have been that,’ said the King, ‘unless it was written to nobody, which isn’t usual, you know.’

‘Who is it directed to?’ said one of the jury-men.

‘It isn’t directed at all,’ said the White Rabbit. ‘In fact, there’s nothing written on the OUTSIDE.’

He opened the paper as he spoke, and added, ‘It isn’t a letter, after all. It’s a poem.’

‘Is it the prisoner’s hand-writing?’ asked another of the jury-men.

‘No, it’s not,’ said the White Rabbit, ‘and that’s the strangest thing about it.’ (The jury all looked puzzled.)

‘He must have written it in somebody else’s hand,’ said the King. (The jury all brightened up again.)

‘Please your Majesty,’ said the Knave. ‘I didn’t write it, and they can’t prove I did. There’s no name signed at the end.’

‘If you didn’t sign it,’ said the King, ‘that only makes the matter worse. You MUST have meant something bad, or else you’d have signed your name like an honest man.’

There was a general clapping of hands at this. It was the first really clever thing the King had said that day.

‘That PROVES his guilt,’ said the Queen.

‘It proves nothing of the sort!’ said Alice. ‘Why, you don’t even know what it’s about!’

‘Read it,’ said the King.

The White Rabbit put on his glasses. ‘Where shall I begin, please your Majesty?’ he asked.

‘Begin at the beginning,’ the King said gravely, ‘and go on till you come to the end: then stop.’

This was the poem the White Rabbit read:

‘They told me you had been to her,

And mentioned me to him:
She gave me a good character,
But said I could not swim.
He sent them word I had not gone
(We know it to be true):
If she should push the matter on,
What would become of you?
I gave her one, they gave him two,
You gave us three or more;
They all returned from him to you,
Though they were mine before.
If I or she should chance to be Involved in this affair,
He trusts to you to set them free,
Exactly as we were.
My idea was that you had been (Before she had this fit)
An obstacle that came between Him, and ourselves, and it.
Don't let him know she liked them best,
For this must ever be
A secret, kept from all the rest,
Between yourself and me.'

'That's the most important piece of evidence we've heard yet,' said the King, rubbing his hands. 'So now the jury –'

'If any one of them can explain it,' said Alice (she had grown so large in the last few minutes that she wasn't a bit afraid of interrupting him), 'I'll give him a quarter. I don't believe there's a bit of meaning in it.'

The jury all wrote down in their note-books, 'SHE doesn't believe there's a bit of meaning in it,' but none of them attempted to explain the paper.

‘If there’s no meaning in it,’ said the King, ‘that saves a world of trouble, you know, as we needn’t try to find any. And yet I don’t know,’ he went on, spreading out the poem on his knee, and looking at it with one eye. ‘I seem to see some meaning in it, after all. “– SAID I COULD NOT SWIM –” You can’t swim, can you?’ he added, turning to the Knave.

The Knave shook his head sadly. ‘Do I look like it?’ he said. (Which he certainly did NOT, being made entirely of cardboard.)

‘All right, so far,’ said the King, and he went on, reading over the poem to himself: ‘“WE KNOW IT TO BE TRUE –” that’s the jury, of course –”I GAVE HER ONE, THEY GAVE HIM TWO –” why, that must be what he did with the cakes, you know –’

‘But, it goes on, “THEY ALL RETURNED FROM HIM TO YOU,”’ said Alice.

‘Why, there they are!’ said the King, with a sense of victory, pointing to the cakes on the table. ‘Nothing can be clearer than THAT. Then again – “BEFORE SHE HAD THIS FIT –” You never had fits, my dear, I think?’ he said to the Queen.

‘Never!’ said the Queen in a fury, throwing an ink-stand at the Lizard as she spoke.

(The unfortunate little Bill had left off writing in his note-book with one finger, as he found it made no mark; but he now began again in a hurry, using the ink that was running down his face as long as it lasted.)

‘Then the words don’t FIT you,’ said the King, looking round the court with a smile.

There was a dead silence.

‘It’s a pun!’ the King added in a hurt tone, and everybody laughed. ‘Let the jury consider their verdict,’ the King said, for about the twentieth time that day.

‘No, no!’’said the Queen. ‘Sentence first – verdict afterwards.’

‘Stuff and nonsense!’ said Alice loudly. ‘The idea of having the sentence first!’

‘Hold your tongue!’ said the Queen, turning purple.

‘I won’t!’ said Alice.

‘Off with her head!’ the Queen shouted at the top of her voice. But nobody moved.

‘Who cares for you?’ said Alice (she had grown to her full size by this time). ‘You’re nothing but a pack of cards!’

At this the whole pack rose up into the air, and came flying down upon her. She gave a little scream, half of fright and half of anger, and tried to beat them off; and found herself lying on the bank, with her head in the lap of her sister, who was gently brushing away some dead leaves that had fluttered down from the trees upon her face.

‘Wake up, Alice dear!’ said her sister; ‘Why, what a long sleep you’ve had!’

‘Oh, I’ve had such a curious dream!’ said Alice, and she told her sister, as well as she could remember them, all these strange Adventures of hers that you have just been reading about.

When she had finished, her sister kissed her, and said, ‘It WAS a curious dream, dear, certainly: but now run in to your tea; it’s getting late.’

So Alice got up and ran off, thinking while she ran, as well she might, what a wonderful dream it had been.

But her sister sat still, just as she left her, leaning her head on her hand, watching the setting sun, and thinking of little Alice and all her wonderful Adventures, till she too began dreaming after a fashion, and this was her dream:

First, she dreamed of little Alice herself, and once again the tiny hands were clasped upon her knee, and the bright eager eyes were looking up into hers. She could hear the very tones of her voice, and see that queer little toss of her head to keep back the wandering hair that WOULD always get into her eyes. And as she listened, or seemed to listen, the whole place around her became alive with the strange creatures of her little sister’s dream.

The long grass whispered softly at her feet as the White Rabbit hurried by – the frightened Mouse noisily swam his way through the neighboring pool – she could hear the rattle of the tea-cups as the March Hare and his friends shared their never-ending meal, and the shrill voice of the Queen ordering off her unfortunate guests to their death – once more the pig-baby was sneezing on the Duchess's knee, while plates and dishes crashed around it – once more the cry of the Gryphon, the noise of the Lizard's pencil, and the choking of the guinea-pigs filled the air, mixed up with the distant cries of the unhappy Mock Turtle.

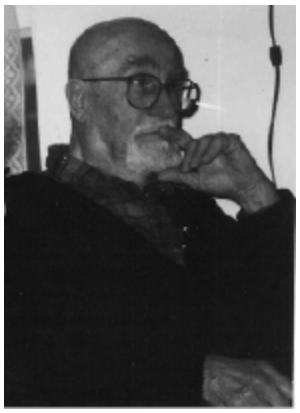
So she sat on, with closed eyes, and half believed herself in Wonderland, though she knew she had but to open them again, and all would change to dull reality – the grass would be only moving in the wind, and the pool rippling to the waving of the reeds – the noise of the tea-cups would change to sound of sheep-bells, and the Queen's loud cries to the voice of the shepherd boy – and the sneeze of the baby, the cry of the Gryphon, and all the other queer noises, would change (she knew) to the usual noises of the busy farm-yard – while the sound of the cattle in the distance would take the place of the Mock Turtle's sad cries.

Lastly, she pictured to herself how this same little sister of hers would, in the after-time, be herself a grown woman; and how she would keep, through all her riper years, the simple and loving heart of her childhood: and how she would gather about her other little children, and make THEIR eyes bright and eager with many a strange tale, perhaps even with the dream of Wonderland of long ago: and how she would feel with all their simple sorrows, and find a pleasure in all their simple joys, remembering her own child-life, and the happy summer days.

THE END

OceanofPDF.com

JOSEPH COWLEY, born on October 9, 1923, graduated from Columbia University in 1947. He interrupted his academic career to serve two and a half years with the Army Air Force during World War II. The last months of service were spent overseas as a bombardier with the Eighth Air Force, for which he was awarded the Bronze Star.



He received his M.A. from Columbia in 1948 and taught English at Cornell before entering sales. His career was spent writing and editing material on sales and management for The Research Institute of America, before taking early retirement in 1982 to work on his fiction and other books.

Joseph Cowley is the author of the novels Home by Seven, The House on Huntington Hill, Dust Be My Destiny The Chrysanthemum Garden, and Landscape With Figure. His other fiction includes the plays Twin Bill (My Life with Women and I Love You, I Love You}, A Jury of His Peers, and The Stargazers; and two collections of shorter fiction Do You Like It and Other Stories and The Night Billy Was Born and Other Love Stories.

He has authored two books of non-fiction: John Adams: Architect of Freedom, and The Executive Strategist, An Armchair Guide to Scientific Decision-Making (with Robert Weisselberg).

He recently adapted Crime and Punishment by Dostoevsky, The Scarlet Letter by Hawthorne, and The Kreutzer Sonata by Tolstoy for ESL students and the general reader. Alice in Wonderland by Lewis Carroll is the fourth volume in this series of Classics Condensed by Cowley.

His articles have appeared in trade and science journals like Our Army and Mechanix Illustrate;, and his short stories in The Maryland Review, Prairie Schooner, New-Story, Ohio Short Fiction, and other literary journals and anthologies.

Joseph Cowley is listed in a number of reference volumes, among them: Who's Who, International Who's Who of Writers and Authors, Who's Who in the World, Strathmore's Who's Who, The Cambridge Blue Book, and 2000 Outstanding Intellectuals of the 21st Century.

Among the organizations he has been associated with are Mensa, The Authors Guild, and the Great Books Program, where he led discussions and served on the L.I. Council for Great Books.

OceanofPDF.com